THIRTIETH PARLIAMENT

Parliament having been summoned by Proclamation to meet this day for the dispatch of business:

The Senate met at 3.00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

COMMUNICATION FROM GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have received the following communication:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

October 11, 1978

Madam:

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General will arrive at the main entrance of the Parliament Buildings at 2.45 p.m. on this day, Wednesday, the 11th of October 1978, and when it has been signified that all is in readiness, will proceed to the Chamber of the Senate to open formally the Fourth Session of the Thirtieth Parliament of Canada.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,

Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler

Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate,

Ottawa.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

At 3 p.m. His Excellency the Governor General proceeded to the Senate Chamber and took his seat upon the Throne. His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and, that House being come, with their Speaker, His Excellency was pleased to open the Fourth

Session of the Thirtieth Parliament of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

I have the honour to welcome you to the Fourth Session of the 30th Parliament of Canada.

During the course of the past summer Her Majesty The Queen came to visit Newfoundland and Saskatchewan, and to open the Commonwealth Games. She joined all Canadians in congratulating the thousands of volunteer workers who helped make the Games so successful, and with all of us she applauded the remarkable achievements of Canadian athletes at Edmonton.

The Duke of Edinburgh visited British Columbia as well, where His Royal Highness took part in the two hundredth anniversary observance of Captain Cook's voyage to the Pacific Coast.

My wife and I paid an official visit to the King and Queen of Spain, who welcomed us most hospitably. Through us, Spain expressed its friendship and high regard for all Canadians.

As the end of my term of office approaches, my wife and I would like to thank parliamentarians and the people of Canada for the respect and affection which they have extended to us on countless occasions over the years.

We wish also to express our love for Canada. A great country is not created without difficulty, but to see it develop and grow stronger despite every obstacle has been for us a source of great joy and pride. Our faith in the future of Canada is stronger than it has ever been.

I: Urgent Action Needed

Parliament begins today a new Session which will concentrate upon Canada's two most pressing needs. They are the strengthening of our economy, and the renewal of our federation.

Those two inseparable imperatives are different expressions of the same goal: to strengthen Canada through unity; to unify Canada through economic strength.

Seldom in the past have the seriousness of the challenge, the strength of our national will, and the scope of our opportunities combined to create for Canada a moment in history so full of potential for good. Such a moment, if ignored, may not soon come again. That is one reason why you should approach your task with urgency.

Another is the legitimate expectation of the people of Canada in these difficult times. They expect their Parliament to respond to their most urgent needs with insight, with action, and with a minimum of delay.

You will therefore be asked to focus your efforts upon the priority areas of the economy and the renewal of the federation.

To that end, the Government has prepared over the past few months a detailed plan of action. It is designed to increase confidence in the essential health and potential of the economy, and to strengthen the bonds which unite us in one Canadian community.

II: Economic Policy Background

The economic initiatives announced by the Government in August will intensify the assault upon unemployment and inflation.

Those initiatives will further restrain government spending, stimulate economic growth, and give more assistance to those in need. They carry forward commitments made by the Government in 1976 with the publication of The Way Ahead. Many of those commitments were endorsed by the First Ministers' Conference in February of this year.

First Ministers agreed to help the private sector to lead the way toward accelerated economic growth. They also reached agreement on important medium-term economic objectives.

In July of this year, Canada was a participant in the Bonn Summit Conference. There the leaders of the major industrialized countries of the free world planned a co-operative strategy against inflation, unemployment and slow growth.

Canada pledged at Bonn to do its part to restore vitality to the Canadian and world economies. After the conference, that pledge was transformed into action in a series of policy announcements.

They require action on two fronts. The first requirement is to further reduce the growth rate of federal spending.

The second is to pare down or eliminate many worthwhile but low-priority programs, in order to free the dollars necessary for a serious assault upon high-priority goals. These goals are to stimulate industrial expansion, put more Canadians back to work, and further protect from the impact of inflation those who are least able to protect themselves.

III: Expenditure Restraint

Let us examine the first of these requirements, restraint in government spending. To achieve sustained progress in the battle against inflation, the Government believes it is absolutely essential for Canadians to practise restraint in their price and income demands. The Government is also aware of its own responsibilities. Expenditure restraint has been a central theme of federal policy and practice since October, 1975. It was reinforced by the First Ministers' joint commitment in February to contain government spending below the trend growth rate of the Gross National Product.

In August, the Government set itself a more ambitious restraint objective. Planned federal spending this fiscal year will be reduced by five hundred million dollars, and next year's projected spending will be reduced by two billion dollars. As a result, the projected rate of expenditure growth during the next fiscal year is 8.9 percent. That is well below the forecast growth of 11 percent for the GNP.

The objectives of imposing more severe restraint on government spending are two.

The first is to encourage a more vigorous expansion of the private sector by reducing governments' share of the nation's wealth.

The second is to create a leaner and more efficient government, by making every tax dollar do more work. The Government is committed to reducing the size of the federal public service. You will be asked to approve amendments to the Public Service Superannuation Act, designed to ensure that public service pensions are in line with the level of contributions.

The Government is committed to continued wage restraint in the public sector. You will be asked to approve amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act to ensure that compensation in the federal public service remains in step with the private sector, and does not lead the way.

You will also be asked to enact legislation making the Post Office a Crown Corporation, with a view to making postal services more efficient and responsive to public needs.

Because such a large portion of the federal budget is dedicated to transfer payments to the provinces, no large-scale restraint program could be successful without their co-operation. The Government intends to negotiate reductions which will cause a minimum of difficulty for provincial governments.

You will be asked to consider amendments to the National Housing Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, and other legislation in order to give effect to the program of expenditure restraint.

IV: Shifting Dollars To Priority Needs

The second major requirement is to transfer funds from lower-priority to high-priority goals. They are industrial expansion, job creation, and more assistance for those in need.

Providing those additional resources within the context of budgetary restraint is a most difficult and painful exercise. Worthwhile programs serving real needs must be cut back if the money is to be found for more pressing requirements.

By cutting back programs in virtually every department, the Government intends to channel one billion dollars into programs of economic and social development.

In the area of economic development, the Government's recent proposals are intended to build upon its earlier initiatives to promote job creation, stimulate private sector growth, and encourage industrial innovation. Those initiatives included the April budget, which cut sales taxes in co-operation with the provinces, and provided a stimulus to non-conventional oil development.

Other measures were announced during June and July to encourage energy conservation and the development of renewable energy sources; to stimulate research and development; and to assist small businesses.

Now the Government proposes to devote more resources to the promotion of industrial development in 1979-80.

The primary objective is to help establish an economic climate which is conducive to private sector growth, particularly in the areas of high technology industries, regional development, and the promotion of exports. Additional assistance will be provided for tourism and for the resource and ship-building industries.

Excessive government intervention in the economy should be greatly reduced over time by initiatives to eliminate duplication between federal and provincial programs and to simplify regulatory and reporting systems.

An important element among the Government's proposed new industrial development priorities is an increase in support for major capital projects in manufacturing, energy and transportation.

The major thrust of the Government's employment strategy is to encourage the creation of permanent jobs in the private sector. Special emphasis is being placed on the training and job placement of young Canadians.

In this new Session, the Government will take action to increase support for the training of an adequate supply of skilled labour and to assist labour market mobility.

The Government also proposes to introduce major changes in the Unemployment Insurance Program. These changes would achieve a substantial reduction in the cost of the program. They are intended to minimize any negative effects which the program may have on the incentive to work, or on the labour supply.

The proposed adjustments would make the program more selective in its coverage. They would also put Unemployment Insurance funds to more productive use, partly to finance an expanded Job Experience Training Program for youth. You will be asked to approve amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to give effect to these changes.

Other new employment strategy measures will focus upon year-round employment programs for young people. A new Youth Job Corps Program will be created. This and other youth employment programs will benefit from a major increase in funding during this fiscal year.

In the field of social policy, the unfair impact of inflation upon lower-income groups calls for further protection.

The most effective way to protect Canadians against the injustices of inflation is to continue to act vigorously to bring inflation down. This requires the co-operation of everyone, and takes time. But the poor cannot wait for that. Nor can lower-income parents with children to support, nor elderly pensioners. We must give them additional help now because their need is urgent.

The Child Benefits System has therefore been redesigned. Family allowance payments will be set at a base rate of $20 per month per child for 1979, so that more aid can be provided to those whose need is greatest. The base rate will be indexed in line with the cost of living after 1979.

Funds saved through this process will be used to provide a yearly payment of $200 per child to mothers in low and middle-income families. Also, there will be an increase of $20 per household in the monthly Guaranteed Income Supplement. This will further protect the elderly from the impact of inflation.

You will therefore be asked to consider amendments to the Family Allowance Act, the Old Age Security Act, and the Income Tax Act.

As an additional anti-inflationary measure, the Government has recently reduced the special excise tax on gasoline by three cents a gallon. Negotiations are under way with the Government of Alberta to defer the one dollar per barrel increase in the price of oil scheduled for January first.

V: Renewal of The Federation

Economic improvement by itself, however, will not guarantee a united country. A renewal of the Canadian federation is equally essential. It was with this conviction that the Government published its proposals for renewal last June in a document entitled A Time For Action. Later that month, the Government placed before Parliament the Constitutional Amendment Bill. It was referred to a Special Joint Committee of Parliament as a basis for a full public discussion of constitutional change.

A Time For Action affirmed the Government's commitment to four basic principles of renewal: the preeminence of citizens and their freedoms; full respect of native rights; full development of Canada's two major linguistic communities; and the enhancement of our mosaic of cultures. It supported development of the regional economies and the fostering of economic integration, so all in Canada can share the benefits of our country more equally. Finally, it recognized the interdependence of the two orders of government, and urged the clear establishment of their respective roles in a renewed Constitution.

A Time For Action stressed the need for a less contentious relationship among the federal and provincial governments, and more effective intergovernmental consultation. Other goals are freedom of action for each government to fulfil its responsibilities, and measures to permit greater accountability by governments to their legislatures and the people who elect them. Also emphasized was the need to help the taxpayers better understand the intergovernmental process; and to provide more effective services at less cost by eliminating wasteful duplication.

The Government therefore proposed to the provincial governments that joint action should begin as soon as possible on the clarification of federal and provincial roles and the elimination of duplication. The Premiers have responded positively. The First Ministers' Conference on the Constitution, now expected to take place at the end of this month, will consider how best to launch this major enterprise.

With respect to the reform of the Constitution, the Government has set out only two fundamental requirements. The new Constitution must provide for Canada to continue as a genuine federation, and it must contain a Charter of Rights and Freedoms, including linguistic rights. The Government has shown its deep concern that real progress toward change soon be achieved, so that uncertainty can be dispelled and unity reinforced. In particular, the Government believes it essential that clear and important progress be made before Quebecers are asked by their provincial government to vote in a referendum about their future.

Because there has been some misunderstanding about two important features of constitutional renewal, the Government wishes to make its position clear once again. The first is the role of the Monarch and the Governor General. The Government's view was and remains that the new Constitution should describe the situation as it exists today in Canada, and the Government is pleased that the provincial premiers expressed the same view during their meeting in Regina. Discussions are already in progress with provincial governments to ensure that the legal drafting conforms to that intention. There is no intention to change or to reduce in any way the role Her Majesty plays.

Secondly, the Government recognizes that the distribution of powers among federal and provincial governments is an essential part of the renewal of the Constitution.

The Government is prepared to begin the study of the distribution of powers at the same time as that of institutions and rights, and to give every aspect of the work a high and urgent priority. Discussions will begin at the meeting of First Ministers later this month.

However, the Government believes that proposals on institutions and rights can be dealt with more rapidly than the distribution of powers, and that action on the former should not be held up if prolonged discussion is needed to settle the latter.

The public hearings of the Task Force on Canadian Unity have provided a valuable forum in which ideas could be brought forward and discussed. The Government is therefore confident that the report of the Task Force will be an important contribution to the process of renewal.

In the course of the present Session, the Government will be introducing in Parliament a revised constitutional bill. With goodwill and flexibility on all sides, and with the shape of Canada's future at stake, the Government is confident that concrete progress will be achieved in the course of this Session.

Neither renewal of the federation nor the maturity of our national structure can be considered complete until the achievement of an amending procedure permits our Constitution to be vested finally and entirely in Canadian hands. In co-operation with the provinces, the Government will again address itself to that question in the new Session.

VI: Social Responsibility and Openness of Government

The Government reaffirms its view that a renewal of faith in Canada requires an active and informed Canadian public.

It is therefore intended to continue consultations with business and labour, private interest groups, and other levels of government.

In addition, you will be asked to consider proposals to increase public access to government information.

In the further promotion of open and efficient government, a proposal will be placed before you to provide for the review by Parliament of evaluations by the Government of major programs.

You will also be asked to consider legislation to create a federal Ombudsman.

You will be asked to consider other legislative proposals.

Members of the House of Commons,

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required to carry on the services and expenditures authorized by Parliament.

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

TERMINATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY ON EIGHTH SITTING DAY

Senator Petten moved, seconded by Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i):

That the proceedings on the order of the day for resuming the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to His Excellency the Governor General's Speech from the Throne addressed to both Houses of Parliament be concluded on the eighth sitting day on which the order is debated.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: I wonder if the Leader of the Government would tell us if the debate on the Speech from the Throne could take eight days to complete. Does he think that we could talk on it for that long?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the official opposition has advanced such a bewildering array of counter-proposals in recent months that the debate could well take 30 days.

Senator Flynn: For you to reply.

Senator Perrault: I earnestly hope that the Leader of the Opposition will attempt to distill the essence of those counter-proposals, and that should take only a short period of time.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

Senator Olson moved, seconded by Senator Williams, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(d):

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed

(1) to inquire into any matter relating to the planning and construction of the pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada

described in An Act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, Chapter 20, Statutes of Canada 1977-78,

(2) to consider, in particular, all reports, orders, agreements, regulations, directions, recommendations and approvals referred to in the said Act, and

(3) to report to the Senate thereon at least once in each session of Parliament during the period of the planning and construction of the pipeline;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee and to adjourn from place to place in Canada; and

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Greene: Honourable senators, before the motion is voted upon, may I say that I note that the committee only has the right to travel within Canada. If I have read my proceedings correctly, the holdup in this matter is largely the result of the activities of a certain small group of senators in Washington, and, with respect, I am going to suggest to the honourable senator proposing the motion that the committee's terms of reference be expanded to enable its members to travel to Washington, where, through their good offices, they might be able to do some spadework with their fellow American senators, which might be more useful than anything else that could be done.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I certainly appreciate the suggestion that the committee's powers be expanded. I did think, however, and I believe with some agreement from the members of the previous committee, that if we were to deem such a trip advisable, we should seek special authority from the chamber at that time.

Whether this is permissible or not, I do not know, but I should like to add that the Senate of the United States did in fact pass the energy bill on September 27, and there are people in Canada, including the company involved, Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Ltd., as well as the Northern Pipeline Agency, who have high hopes—justifiably high hopes—that the House of Representatives will deal positively with the bill this week.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, October 17, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like to give a short summary of the business of the Senate for next week.

When we return on Tuesday evening we shall proceed with the Throne Speech debate. I understand that the Honourable Senator Flynn and the Honourable Senator Perrault are scheduled to speak on Tuesday night.

Senator Flynn: A great night!

Senator Petten: It is expected that we shall be able to hold a meeting of the Committee of Selection on Wednesday or, at the latest, Thursday, of next week, to nominate senators to serve on the several select committees of the Senate during the present session.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session.

[Translation]

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto moved, seconded by Hon. Florence B. Bird:

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Jules Léger, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit, holder of the Canadian Armed Forces decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious Speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

He said: Honourable senators, first I would like to pay a tribute to the Honourable Senator Renaude Lapointe, our distinguished Speaker.

Allow me to congratulate her for her excellent work in this house and for her special way of preserving order with her usual charm and kindness.

[English]

I also wish to compliment our leader for the laborious work he performs. I am grateful and thank him for the confidence he has bestowed upon me by permitting me to move this motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

[Translation]

Though I have been given, on several occasions, the opportunity to address this house, I can assure you that the honour bestowed upon me today is a source of very great satisfaction and considerable emotions.

I am very happy to see that our government is getting set to take the steps necessary to make our social policies more stringent while increasing our help to those who are in real need of it. It will also endeavour to change our laws in order to fight the abuses we have witnessed in the last few years.

We are all conscious of the fact that our government has made a real effort to help the needy, but we have also been aware that in so doing, in trying to improve the social conditions of the people, we have created a situation in which abuses on every hand are increasing constantly. Now, to remedy the situation, the government must take adequate steps, but these will be efficient only with the cooperation of each and every one.

When I say that the people as a whole must cooperate, I think mainly of businessmen and industrialists who must assume their responsibilities and face the future of our society, and not limit themselves to producing more and more to increase their profits. The same goes for union leaders who, while keeping in mind the interests of our workers, must take into consideration our productivity as well as salary increases.

And so balance would be maintained, the requirements of the marketplace would be met, our goods exported abroad, our natural resources developed while ensuring work to all Canadians, including the young people who must enter the labour market.

I am happy to see that the constitutional changes will be discussed in the weeks to come. We know now, honourable senators, that if the question were put to the people the great majority of them would be in favour of those changes. But when it comes to the division of powers differences arise.

We all have demands, and sometimes very difficult demands to meet. I think we should act with wisdom and moderation so that every individual, every province and every government will be able to protect their rights adequately by taking into consideration all citizens in all areas. I think that is the approach to be taken if we really want to arrive at valid and long term solutions. Otherwise, certain groups would be favoured to the detriment of others and there is a great risk that today's solutions will become tomorrow's problems.

Yes, honourable senators, we have to be proud of our country. We have to be proud of the fact that despite our present problems we can still find in our country social peace, democracy and freedom. So, to preserve that climate of peace and freedom, we have to make sacrifices, we have to make the workers and the leaders of our country aware of the importance of preserving that social peace which is the apportion of justice and understanding. There is no wealth comparable to tranquility, serenity and harmony.

We are aware of the situation that exists in certain countries where the poor do not have anything to eat and where others cannot live serenely for fear of retaliation against themselves or their families. I do not want to dramatize but I think that if we thought about it for a minute we could really appreciate the advantages of our position.

Obviously we too have problems, but with goodwill and ponderation we should certainly find some answers. Indeed the reforms now advocated make Canadians feel protected and considered as first class citizens. But to reach that objective it is obvious that some compromise and sacrifices must be made on both sides.

We cannot ask the Province of Quebec to grant full rights and privileges to the English-speaking minority if major French-speaking minorities in the rest of the country, in Ontario or New Brunswick for instance, are not treated equally. The rights of minorities should not be respected at the expense of the majority. I believe that the fate of Quebec Anglophones does not depend on the Quebec government alone but mainly on the Ontario and New Brunswick governments. Obviously, unless those governments guarantee certain privileges to the French-speaking minority under their jurisdiction, the English-speaking minority in Quebec will be treated on the same basis.

I do not understand some people who stand as fervent champions of French Canadians when they ask for the separation of the Province of Quebec, as they are certainly aware that if they achieve separation they will abandon more than 1,000,000 French Canadians living outside Quebec.

I believe, honourable senators, that we in this house should act as guardians ready to intervene every time the rights of the minority are threatened.

As concerns the reform of the Senate, we should show some wisdom while taking into account the opinion and the demands of the people.

Personally, I partially agree on proposals contained in Bill C-60 concerning the Senate. I would accept that 50 per cent of senators be appointed by the federal government and the other 50 per cent by provinces for a term of ten years. But I entirely disagree with the proposal that senators be appointed by political parties, federal and provincial. In fact, I consider that this procedure would encourage patronage with no regard for the needs of the country and Parliament. You could reply that my proposal holds the same risk. It is true but it is much easier to detect and consequently easier to prevent as it is more limited and easier to identify.

[English]

But I persist in believing that the Senate should continue its work, redouble its efforts in its role as guardian of fundamental liberties and promoter of social justice and peace.

[Translation]

Allow me, honourable senators, to call upon all the mass media, which will have a very important role to play in the coming months as reporters of the great constitutional debates that we foresee. Their role will be to inform the population, in a constructive way, and to shun the temptation of bias and prejudice, and that goes for the French and English sides alike.

I remain convinced that given co-operation and goodwill on everybody's part, we will preserve the social peace and unity of our country.

I thank you, honourable senators, for the attention you have paid to my brief speech.

[English]

Hon. Florence Bird: Honourable senators, I am honoured to be asked to second the motion for an Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is a privilege for which I am grateful and a responsibility which I hope I can fulfil.

I congratulate Senator Rizzuto for his well considered and pertinent analysis of the problems threatening the unity of our country.

This is, I think, a fitting occasion for me to express my satisfaction in being designated to Carleton. I chose Carleton because it was the place of the Honourable Senator Gratton O'Leary. Senator O'Leary and I did not share the same political loyalties, but he was, nonetheless, a valued friend who was always helpful and kind to me. I admired him because he was a first-class working newspaperman, a credit to the fourth estate to which my late husband and I belonged for so many years.

I know, alas, that I can never bring to this historic house the wit and humour, the Irish warmth, and the earthy wisdom of my predecessor. Only in love of our country can I presume to equal him. In that, I am as steadfast as he ever was.

The Throne Speech has outlined a heavy burden of business essential to the good government of our country.

The need for serious retrenchment and spending restraint by the federal government is a harsh necessity. The proposed stern austerity measures must be carried out with efficiency, with courage, and with dispatch, no matter how painful the process may be. For too long Canada has been living beyond her income and, for a nation, as for a family, that can only spell inevitable disaster.

I support the government's decision to transfer funds into programs of economic and social development. I feel strongly that social services designed to assist deprived people in our society must not be reduced. I, therefore, applaud the concrete proposals that have been made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable Monique Bégin. They should help to provide an improved standard of living for many people now living on the edge of poverty. They may also help to keep our economy on an even keel.

The proposed $20 increase in benefits to old age pensioners who are receiving the guaranteed annual income supplement will enable 1,200,000 people to buy a few necessities that they have been forced to do without. Inflation, and especially the high cost of food, has brought real hardship to over half of Canada's old people who rely on the guaranteed income supplement to supply their daily bread. The projected increase recognizes the principle that it is the responsibility of government to look after those in need.

I also support the proposed indexed family allowance of $20 a month and the introduction of the new refundable tax credit. The tax credit is designed to help Canada's working poor and to give a much better chance in life to a million and a half children who live in poor families. Middle income families will, of course, also be helped.

Eight years ago a guaranteed annual income based on a negative income tax method was recommended as a cushion against deprivation by the Senate Committee on Poverty, which was so splendidly guided by its chairman, the Honourable David Croll. This was also recommended by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. The GIS was a first step toward a guaranteed annual income for every Canadian, and the proposed refundable tax credit is a second step. No doubt we will continue to move toward that ultimate goal when an increase in the gross national product makes it feasible.

An inevitable advance toward social equity is being made by the proposal to withhold the tax credit from families earning over $26,000 a year. The time has come, whether we like it or not, to apply a means test for some social security services. This has long been done in Scandinavian countries, which have achieved a much higher degree of equity than we have. Here in Canada a means test has always been an unpopular concept, with the result that it has been shunned by politicians. But it must be accepted now on the ground of equity, as the Honourable Monique Bégin wants to do. There are other advantages to the refundable tax credit. It is intended to act as a stimulus to the Canadian economy by giving money to people who will spend it on Canadian goods and services—on housing, clothing, shoes, and so forth—rather than on imported luxuries and trips abroad.

I welcome the government's intention to proceed with constitutional reform. During the past summer, as a member of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, I have absorbed the testimony of many informed witnesses and reached a number of well-considered conclusions. It was a relief to hear in the Throne Speech that the government plans to introduce, instead of that ill-conceived Bill C-60, a revised constitutional bill—one which will take into account the recommendations of the Task Force on Canadian Unity as well as, I assume, the excellent report of the earlier Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada, which was tabled in 1972.

Certainly this new document should not be introduced in Parliament until there has been consultation with acknowledged experts in constitutional law and, most important, with people who have had long and practical experience with the work of legislative bodies and their relationship with the administrative and executive arms of government. With all due respect to political scientists, many of them seem to have theories which, though interesting, are often impractical or unsuitable in the light of Canadian history and tradition.

[Senator Bird.]

I hope that in attempting to frame a new Constitution consideration will be given to the evolutionary concept of the constitutional process. A famous decision by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council referred to this concept in elegantly metaphorical language. I allude, of course, to the famous "persons" case of 1929, in which the Privy Council overruled the Supreme Court decision and declared that women are persons and so are eligible to sit in the Senate.

When Britain's Lord Chancellor, Lord Sankey, read the decision before the court he made a statement that has particular significance today. He said:

The British North America Act planted in Canada a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits. The object of the Act was to grant a Constitution to Canada.

Lord Sankey then quoted Sir Robert Borden's famous comment:

Like all written constitutions it has been subject to development through usage and convention.

Honourable senators, it seems to me essential that the opportunity for future evolution be preserved by avoiding an excess of legislative rigidity. In other words, we must have room for the political as well as the judicial processes to operate.

I hope that in introducing a new bill the government will abandon its timetable for action. Even if the Supreme Court decides that the government has the legal right to act unilaterally, I feel strongly, for the good of the country and especially for the sake of national unity, that it would be neither the part of wisdom nor of statesmen to undertake any action without the approval of the legislatures of the provinces as well as of Parliament. We should not abandon our tradition of parliamentary democracy based on representative government that has served us so well.

In any case, it seems to me that Phases I and II of the program proposed by the government in Bill C-60 put the cart before the horse. Surely the logical way of proceeding would be, first, to reach agreement on an amending formula more flexible and realistic than the present one requiring agreement by all ten of the provinces. In doing that we would bring to an end the pointless charade of having to go to Westminster as we do now. Secondly, agreement should be reached on the distribution of powers between the provinces and the federal government. Thirdly, we should bring about institutional reforms based on our present parliamentary representative democracy and the division of legislative and administrative responsibilities, which has served us so well for so long.

I well realize, honourable senators, that the distribution of powers is a tough and knotty issue. It is good news that the government is now prepared to study this matter at the same time as institutions and rights, but I regret that this study does not have the highest priority, second only to finding an amending formula.

The distribution of powers, more than any other constitutional issue, seems to be responsible for the present winter of our discontent. As we all know, originally, for historical reasons, our federal system was highly centralized. A succession of Privy Council judgments has turned it into one of the most decentralized in the world. Prices, wages, education, health and welfare, housing, resources, rentals, land use planning and much of environmental law have all been put under provincial jurisdiction. Federal spending and federal taxation powers and language rights seem to be the main sources of provincial distemper at the present time, and yet today the serious social and economic problems that we all face together require the maximum of co-operation between the provinces and the federal government.

I wholly support a charter of rights and freedoms being entrenched in the Constitution. It is of utmost importance that our aspirations in regard to human rights be included not only in the federal jurisdiction but also in the jurisdictions of all ten provinces. The federal government and all of the provinces now have human rights acts. However, we need a charter that cannot be tampered with except by the lengthy and thoughtful process that should be involved in constitutional amendment. In drafting such a charter, we should take into consideration the dangers involved in codification and be sure that we don't omit some important matters and include others that will not stand the test of time.

In the last resort, changes in the Constitution will not keep our country together and give us order and good government unless there is a strong will to forswear the present trend toward balkanization with all its evils. If we are to survive as a nation we must cultivate patience, tolerance, understanding and wisdom combined with an indomitable will to compromise and live together in an atmosphere of mutual respect and amity.

Although I approve the general thrust of the Speech from the Throne, I regret that there are certain omissions. It is a pity that the government has not accepted the moderate and sensible recommendation in regard to abortion made by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

It is unfortunate too that the Speech does not contain reaffirmation by the government of its intention to provide special programs, not only for youth training but also for women in order to bring them into the mainstream of Canadian life. During this period of economic difficulties and anxiety, we need to recruit all the skills and abilities we can muster. To do that we should develop the potential of people who have hitherto not been given the opportunity or the encouragement they need to make the maximum contribution to our society.

I understand the government's dissatisfaction with the high cost of unemployment insurance and the way some people are misusing it. I am, however, concerned that changes may discriminate against innocent people who have contributed to the fund in good faith and with some sacrifice. I fear that many working wives would be unjustly penalized by suggestions that secondary wage earners in a family be denied regular benefits. Some husbands would, of course, also be penalized since, among many young couples, the wife is often the primary earner. The Unemployment Insurance Commission has never made a study of women claiming regular benefits, and this should certainly be done before any amendments to the act are made.

I have heard rumours, I hope unfounded, that pressure will be brought to bear on the government to deny women the right to maternity benefits. To do that would be a sad retrogression, an abandonment of a well-established principle of social justice. The inclusion of maternity benefits in the act was one of the most carefully considered recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. It has been supported wholeheartedly by women's groups throughout the country, by unions, and, of course, by working women who demand the right to have children as well as to contribute to the family income or to pursue a productive and useful career.

The loss to the nation in consumer buying power will be considerable if married women in general, and women on maternity leave in particular, do not receive the benefits they and their employers have paid for. Children will also suffer since many mothers will be forced, by financial need, to go back to work instead of being able to stay at home for 17 weeks while they collect maternity benefits—that is, during the period when a lasting bond of love between an infant and its mother takes place, a most important development for the future happiness and security of a child. Many mothers will have to go back to work, because inflation has made two pay cheques a necessity in most families in order to pay off mortgages, feed the family and buy clothes for the children.

We must be on guard to make sure that, in our efforts to pass corrective legislation, we do not commit an injustice towards deserving people.

In conclusion, I feel impelled, driven by deep concern, to talk about the atmosphere of uncertainty, the lack of self-confidence and the neurotic anxiety prevailing in Canada at this time. The newspaper headlines cry havoc. People are howling, moaning and groaning about the state of the nation. Many wring their hands with despair at the suggestion that they may have to live more simply in order to help less fortunate men and women here at home or in other countries where the need is so great. They blame the government for the unholy combination of unemployment and inflation which is, of course, global and not confined to Canada only. They point with horror at the weakening of our dollar which is inevitably influenced by the weakening American dollar.

I think this attitude of pessimism and gloom is not only deplorably negative but extremely destructive. It is time we snapped out of it. It occurs to me that it might give us a better sense of proportion if we take a short look at what has happened to us in the past.

Between 1914 and 1918, 60,000 of our finest and fittest young men died in the mud of Flanders or were crucified on the wire in no-man's-land, and three times that number came home wounded in body or mind. During those days, Canadians knew the pity and terror of Ypres and Passchendaele, the agony and glory of what happened at Vimy Ridge. Then, too, there was the bitterness and resentment occasioned by the Conscription Act of 1917. Those were dark and terrible days, but we came through. Is there anything happening here today that compares to what we suffered during the First World War?

Look back again for a minute. In 1933, one out of every five people in the labour force was out of work. In cities, one out of two was without a job. I find it misleading and mischievous when, from time to time, I read or hear that we are in a hopeless state because there are more unemployed in Canada than there were during the depression. In actual numbers that is true. Today about 850,000 people are out of work; in 1933, 826,000 were unemployed. However, these statistics take on a different emphasis when we consider that 45 years ago there were only 7,300,000 people over 14 in the country while today there are 17½ million. Unemployment for all of Canada during the depression amounted to a bit more than 19 per cent of the labour force. Today it is 8½ per cent, but 8½ per cent is, of course, too much and is causing worry and hardship. The Throne Speech indicates that new efforts will be made to increase Canada's productivity so that more jobs will be available. It is proper that we should be worried about unemployment, and the inflation that is so cruel to pensioners and poor people. Nevertheless, the truth is that the difficult times we are going through today bear no resemblance to what happened to us during the great depression.

I was living in Montreal at that time. The streets were full of beggars, and half a dozen times a day men knocked at the door asking for handouts. In the evenings, men lined up in front of the Grey Nuns' for a bowl of soup, or milled around in front of the Anglican Cathedral asking for bread. Men rode on the rods under the railroad cars, or sat in the bitter cold and wind on top of the boxcars, often 40 or 50 men on one car, shunting back and forth across the country in search of jobs that did not exist. Young men finished school with high marks and high hopes, to find they were wanted by no one, that there was nothing for them to do and nowhere for them to go.

And there was drought on the prairies. In 1938, Saskatchewan harvested a pitiful 36 million bushels of wheat which sold at the Lakehead for 68 cents a bushel in terms of the value of the dollar in 1977. Last year our great wheat-growing province produced 467 million bushels, which sold for $4.62 a bushel.

Back in the thirties, a Saskatchewan girl, Anne Marriot, wrote a poem called The wind our enemy, which won the Governor General's award. A few lines of it may remind you of those days:

Wind
in a lonely laughterless shrill game with broken wash-boiler, bucket without a handle, Russian thistle, throwing up sections of soil.

God, will it never rain again? What about those clouds out west? No, that's just dust, as thick and stifling now as winter underwear.

No rain, no crop, no feed, no faith, only wind.

Those were dark days for many of us, but we and our institutions of government, our forms of government, survived. We came through.

Let me remind you that at that time there were no universal old age pensions, no Canada Pension Plan, no hospital or medical insurance, no nationwide public assistance, no unemployment insurance, no family allowances. Today, we have all these things to insulate us against suffering and disaster. Why, I ask, honourable senators, do Canadians complain so loudly?

As I meditate about the past my memory brings back to me a Christmas morning in Winnipeg during the Second World War. It was a bright, clear, cold day with hoar frost on the trees turning everything into a beautiful, mysterious fairy land. That was the day we heard that Hong Kong had fallen and the Winnipeg Grenadiers and the Quebec Rifles had been taken prisoner. Can anything we know today match the grief that each day, each week, each month brought to us for six long years? But in those days we believed in ourselves. We had confidence in ourselves and our institutions, and we came through.

After Franklin Roosevelt first became president, he told the American people they had nothing to fear but fear itself. Today I think we have nothing to fear but ourselves. In Charlie Brown's famous phrase, "We have met the enemy and them is us." Our unwarranted lack of confidence in ourselves can, if we don't watch out, bring us to the edge of despair, and I remind you that despair is the most deadly and destructive of sins since it is the antithesis of hope.

The more I think about it the more I realize that Canadians are fortunate among people. It is 66 years since our country was invaded. Bombs have never reduced our cities to flaming rubble as happened to London and Coventry, Hamburg and Hiroshima. We and our children have never been raked by machine gun fire while fleeing from our homes in terror of the enemy, as happened at Guernica and on the roads of France. Few Canadians have died from starvation, as have millions of people in Africa or Asia. We have never been torn apart by a fratricidal civil war, as has our neighbour to the south. The war between the states turned many a brother against brother, father against son, and wife against husband. It left behind a pall of bitterness that still flares forth from time to time. The south has never forgiven Sherman, even if the north has forgotten him. I would remind honourable senators that Sherman was a general who led his soldiers with a scorched earth strategy across Georgia, from Chattanooga to the sea. May we never have to endure anything as terrible as that.

We are rich. Our standard of living puts us with the top seven richest nations in the world. We have a great cultural inheritance. Our official languages come to us from England and France, two of the most civilized countries of the West. Our society has been constantly refreshed and enriched by people from many diverse cultures who have come to make their homes and raise their children here.

And, honourable senators, we have this great land. There is a story I have told and written before, but I hope you will bear with me if I tell it again. It is very short. Back in the forties, the late Philias Côté, the member of Parliament for Matapédia-Matane, went out west for the first time. On a clear winter's morning, a friend persuaded him to go to the top of the old Palliser Hotel in Calgary. He looked westward then at the magical moment when the rising sun painted the great white wall of the Rockies with many shades of crimson. Overwhelmed by so much beauty he turned to his friend and said, "This is the most grandiose country that God is ever making."

What had overwhelmed him was, of course, the sudden realization that it was his country that stretched before him. Philias Côté's grammar may not have been of the best, but he communicated, and that is what language is supposed to do.

I know well how he felt. For 30 years I have spent every summer in Quebec beside a small lake in the Gatineau. The nearest neighbour is half a mile away, and there is no other cottage on the lake.

Literally thousands of times I have sat on the veranda during the hours just before sunset, when the wood thrush sings its glorious song, and the heron, after fishing in the shallows of the lake, takes off on huge slow wings to go home for the night. On such summer evenings the air smells of pine and balsam, and pink clouds are reflected in the mirror of the clear water. In those happy hours of peace and tranquility I have often thought, "C'est le pays le plus magnifique que le Bon Dieu a jamais fait." Honourable senators, my French is not very good, but I hope I have communicated with you what I feel.

It is with confidence and hope that I second the motion of Senator Rizzuto for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I intend to move the adjournment of the debate until the next sitting, but before doing so I must congratulate the seconder of the motion on a most interesting and moving speech. We knew, of course, of Senator Bird's talents, but she has revealed them today in a manner which I am sure we all deeply appreciate.

There is an essential difference between Senator Bird's speech and that of Senator Rizzuto. Senator Bird obviously felt that on an occasion such as this one should endeavour to make a good, substantial speech. Having thus concluded, she was forced to digress from discussing the Speech from the Throne, because there is nothing in it. On the other hand, while Senator Rizzuto's was a very good speech, he felt he had to stick to what is contained in the Throne Speech, and, consequently, it was quite short.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 17, 1978, at 8 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government does not need to worry and look embarrassed. I am not going to ask him a question about yesterday's by-elections. I merely want to ask him about the progress of Bill C-8 in the other place. Does he expect it to come to the Senate tonight, and does he expect us to deal with it and have royal assent before we leave tonight?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, at the present time there are indications that the other place will have dealt with the measure by 9.15 this evening. There is the possibility then that the bill will be here at some point later this evening. Hopefully, because of the urgency of the situation, it may be possible for honourable senators to deal with all of its stages before we leave this evening. However, this is a matter which I shall be pleased to discuss with the Leader of the Opposition during the course of the evening.

I can say that the members of the loyal opposition in the other place have been very co-operative in efforts to expedite consideration of this measure. However, co-operation must be forthcoming from all elements in the other place and in this chamber to make sure that this bill can become law in the next few hours.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

PROVINCIAL LIBERAL LEADERSHIP CONVENTION—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege to draw attention to an error in a Toronto newspaper. I have before me a copy of the Globe and Mail of Saturday, October 14, 1978.

Senator Greene: Shame.

Senator Bonnell: Under the heading, "PEI Liberals to elect leader in December," it states:

Charlottetown (CP)—The governing Prince Edward Island Liberals will hold a leadership convention on December 9 to choose a permanent leader. The new leader would replace former premier Alex Campbell, who resigned on September 19. Finance Minister Bennett Campbell was appointed interim premier and party leader four days after the resignation. Senator Lorne Bonnell has told the party caucus and executive he would run.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Which way?

Senator Bonnell: I wish to inform honourable senators, friends, and the people throughout Canada that the word "not" was left out and that the concluding words should be:

—he would not run.

I wish to assure you that I will be here in the Senate—

Senator Steuart: —for as long as it lasts.

Senator Bonnell: —for some time yet, provided my health prevails. I would like to correct the Canadian Press and the Globe and Mail. I will not be a contestant for the leadership. I will not be conscripted, and I cannot be drafted.

Senator Flynn: A very wise decision.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I commend the honourable senator for his discretion and prudence.

THE CONSTITUTION

IMPACT OF BY-ELECTION RESULTS ON AMENDING LEGISLATION—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I should like to know if the Leader of the Government thinks the results of the by-elections of yesterday will convince the government not to push forward with Bill C-60 with respect to the abolition of the Senate.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as far as the events of yesterday are concerned, as one thinks back to the sequence of events a few months prior to and on the dates of the 1972 and 1974 general elections, one can only believe that the events of yesterday may represent but a temporary aberration in the voting patterns in this country. Perhaps when the supreme election decision faces the Canadian people a few months from now they may re-assess their political judgments.

Senator Asselin: The results will be worse.

Senator Smith (Colchester): You may get no votes.

Senator Perrault: As far as Bill C-60 is concerned, the government has not at any point insisted that it must be presented to Parliament intact for passage at some future date. Bill C-60 and the white paper on the Constitution which preceded it were designed to bring about the kind of vigorous discussion that has in fact taken place over the summer months. A number of excellent ideas have emerged from many directions, including ideas from the opposition parties and the provinces, and I think that ultimately the result may be a very much improved bill.

Senator Smith (Colchester): And ideas from senators.

Senator Perrault: Indeed.

GREAT LAKES SHIPPING

STRIKE OF ENGINEERS AND DECK OFFICERS—QUESTION

Senator McDonald: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question with respect to the Great Lakes shipping strike. I know that all of us across Canada are very concerned about the postal strike, and the answer the Leader of the Government has given us is encouraging. However, many people, especially those in western Canada, have equal if not more concern about the strike of engineers and deck officers on the Great Lakes. Can the Leader of the Government give us any information on whether they will be legislated back to work, or whether this strike can be settled in the very near future through arbitration or some other means?

Senator Perrault: The government is very much aware of the urgency and importance of the situation and the need to find a satisfactory resolution of the dispute. I have been informed—and I hope to confirm it very shortly—that Upper Lakes Shipping have in fact now signed an agreement. This company has, I understand, something like 26 vessels out of a total of 125 involved in the dispute. Negotiations are continuing, and it is hoped that a solution can be found shortly. If further information is available this evening it will be brought to the chamber.

Senator Argue: I should like to add my voice to that of Senators McDonald and Perrault. I just want to point out something that I am sure many of you know. The Canadian Wheat Board is daily losing sales because of this tie-up. There is involved, between now and the close of shipping, the shipment of some $450 million worth of grain, so it is very important to the western economy, and to the whole Canadian economy. I am encouraged by the statement of the Leader of the Government, and I am sure he will speak for all senators when he relates this urgency to the government.

Senator Flynn: A senator defending regional aspirations and interests.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 12, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Rizzuto, seconded by Senator Bird, for an Address in reply thereto.

● (2020)

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the traditional speech I have to make on the occasion of the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne is, from all standpoints as far as I am concerned, the most distressing.

Yesterday's vote did suggest to me that I could have dispensed with participating in this debate. After all, the people spoke. They gave their opinion of the Speech from the Throne and the government's policy. But in any case that vote—and this will please my friend Senator Denis—will have shortened my comments, perhaps not enough, but yet shortened them. It will also have toned them down because, you know me, I never like to hit someone who is down. You know my very kind nature.

Senator Langlois: Angelical.

Senator Flynn: Yes, angelical—I readily accept Senator Langlois' suggestion.

In any case, we are beginning a session that should not be taking place. I believe the government will say with hindsight that it should never have taken place.

Every cloud has a silver lining. So I take consolation in the fact that last session—yes, the last one, I imagine—of this Parliament will have given their Excellencies the Governor General and Madame Léger another opportunity to come and meet Parliament before the end of their term in office. This also gives me an opportunity to extend to them on behalf of the official opposition our sincere compliments and our gratitude for the admirable, even courageous, way in which they discharged their difficult and delicate responsibilities. We wish them well on the eve of their departure from Rideau Hall for a well-deserved and, hopefully, very happy retirement.

The other consolation, of course, will be the fact that this session will have extended the term of the Honourable Ren-aude Lapointe. Last year at the beginning of the previous session when rumors of an election in the fall of 1977 had just been dissipated, she heard the same reaction from me. I would like to offer her our compliments and the assurance of our full co-operation.

The other night I had an opportunity to make a few comments about the speeches of the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I repeat them again—my congratulations on a job well done in rather trying circumstances.

I wrote those comments only this morning following the events yesterday, because if I had done so earlier, they could have been irrelevant.

I asked myself what was the appropriate thing to say under the circumstances. If conditions had been normal, as they were last year or two years ago, I would have spoken directly about the measures described in the Speech from the Throne with regard to the economic and political conditions in the country. I will, of course, allude to those matters, taking into consideration the non-confidence vote that the government has received from almost one million electors. It is indeed a post-mortem of the defeat which it has just suffered and I would like to outline a few particulars.

Generally speaking, I would say that the government was told by the electors of fifteen constituencies throughout Canada that they are tired of its clumsy and off-handed dealings with Canadians and the way it tackles the serious problems now arising.

Let us consider first the attitude of the government towards Canadians. It has taken a cavalier attitude. Indeed for over a year, we have been facing the prospect of a general election which will probably be held only in the spring of 1979 and perhaps later as I will explain in a few minutes.

We remember that the government was on the verge of calling an election last fall and indicated afterwards that it would be held last spring. Remember the situation that prevailed in Parliament before the Easter recess. We were being pushed, we were being told: hurry up, pass the legislation, so that an election can be held in June. Then at some point, in May if I am not mistaken, the election was postponed because of a poll that did not favour the government. There was talk then of a July or early September election. With that in mind, the government tabled in early June their white paper and Bill C-60 dealing with constitutional reform. There was a clear intention to provide an election issue designed to draw the people's attention away from serious economic problems and the government's clumsiness in dealing with them.

Then came another poll that was also unfavourable. Maybe then the election should be postponed until October or early November.

Mr. Trudeau went to Bonn and on his way back he announced an economic and administrative program that had all the makings of an electoral platform for the coming fall. If this was not the case, you must readily admit at least implicitly if not openly, the program would have been announced in the Throne Speech of a session that could have started a number of weeks ago.

Then came another poll, in late August or early September, and the Liberal prospects became more dismal still. Once more the election was postponed and this time as it should, if anything goes as it should with this government, to the spring of 1979.

The Prime Minister who, on March 1, 1978, had announced for October 16 a number of by-elections which had made everybody laugh at the time since, evidently, they were to be preceded by a general election because of the time lapse between the announcement date and the expected date, that is, 7½ months later, decided early in September to add some other by-elections.

He was looking for some sort of more precise opinion poll in typical areas of Canada, especially Toronto. Of course, Toronto was a trouble spot for the government. We know the result. Interviewed last night, the Prime Minister stated he will spend the next six months convincing the people that his leadership is needed, that the measures he is now proposing are effective, in the belief clearly stated indeed by the government leader earlier that the Liberal Party is the only one capable of saving and managing Canada.

If, in the spring of 1979, public opinion should still be against him, can we not believe that he could prolong the delay and put back the date of the elections until the fall of 1979 since, technically, he is entitled to do so. Moreover, by carrying this joke as far as it will go, and since this Parliament can go on until July 31, 1979, there is nothing to force the Prime Minister to call elections since he only has to ensure that a new Parliament will be elected during the year so that there will be a new session within one year of the session which has just begun, and we could therefore have general elections only in the summer of 1980.

There is no doubt that the Prime Minister has abused his discretionary power—and I should say his overly discretionary power—to call elections when he feels like it. He has kept Canadians on tenterhooks for so long that they have seized the first opportunity to let him know that they do not appreciate an attitude which virtually equals contempt towards them.

In passing, this discretionary power of the Prime Minister to call elections should certainly be examined, and restricted if need be, while we are studying proposals for a new Constitution.

I have just talked about the attitude of the government towards the general public.

The successive postponements of general elections are an insult not only for the population but also for Parliament. How can Parliament, and especially the House of Commons, operate with this sword of Damocles hanging over its head?

We must admit that the Prime Minister has never shown much admiration or understanding for the House. He does not really appreciate debate. Members of Parliament, as indeed any opposition to his views, often make him lose patience. The announcement of his economic program on his return from Bonn, which should have been made in a Speech from the Throne and before Parliament, also shows what little respect he has for this institution. As for his views about the Senate, I shall come back to this later on.

At this stage, there is no need to do anything more to convince you that he is not very interested, or at least favourably impressed, by what goes on in this assembly.

[English]

Honourable senators, I have given my analysis of the attitude of the government toward the population and Parliament—an attitude which I can only describe as sheer contempt. Let us look at the way in which the government has dealt with the question of a new Constitution for Canada. As I mentioned, the government, at the beginning of June, tabled its white paper entitled A Time for Action: Toward the Renewal of the Canadian Federation; and introduced Bill C-60.

A time for action! Was it really a time for action with a general election looming on the horizon? Was it a time for action given a government then four years old? More particularly, was it the way to act for the government to say that it intended to proceed unilaterally on Phase I, setting as a deadline July 1, 1979? Was it a way to act when, on Phase II, it also threatened to proceed unilaterally if no agreement were reached with the provinces by July 1981?

Perhaps honourable senators will ask where I find this intention. Clause 125 of the bill, and others following, set out that the mere adoption of Bill C-60 would constitute an Address to Westminster to pass legislation bringing Phase II into force and patriating the Constitution, even with no amending formula having been agreed upon and without any agreement on the part of the provinces.

Of course, the joint committee was quick to point out that legally it was very doubtful whether Parliament had the right to move unilaterally on Phase I, and the government was forced to refer the matter to the Supreme Court.

But even if the Supreme Court were to rule that the government was right on a legal basis, the intention to proceed unilaterally was extremely dangerous on the political level, as was shown by the unanimous protest of the premiers in Regina.

The debate on this question has forced the government to back away from its original plan of action, and the Speech from the Throne now speaks of a revised bill and speaks of goodwill and flexibility on all sides—and when it says “on all sides” I suppose that would include its own side.

The government is now apparently prepared to wait, before introducing constitutional proposals, for the outcome of the scheduled conference of first ministers, and even for a report from the Pepin-Robarts Commission. However, in the meantime, the government has irritated provincial governments and many segments of the population. In this exercise the government has shown the same lack of flexibility as it has in so many other areas. It has shown contempt for the provinces and for Parliament.

We can only hope that the new attitude which the government promises to adopt will clear the air and provide a more favourable climate for a renewal of the federation, a climate devoid of the obvious electoral objectives inherent in Bill C-60 and the explanatory documents which accompanied it.

One last word in this chapter.

In the Speech from the Throne, the government repeats something that was in the white paper entitled, A Time for Action, and I quote:

In particular, the government believes it essential that clear and important progress be made before Quebecers are asked by their provincial government to vote in a referendum about their future.

In the joint committee and elsewhere, it was repeatedly pointed out to the government that Bill C-60 did not offer Quebecers anything that could incite them to vote one way or the other in the coming referendum. Certainly not the abolition of the Senate and its replacement by the House of the Federation; certainly not the changes in the Supreme Court and the appointment of its judges; certainly not the insertion of a Charter of Human Rights in the Constitution; none of these would have any influence upon the attitude of Quebecers towards the federation, not even the provision respecting linguistic rights.

Only a solution of the problems surrounding clarification of the division of powers between the two levels of government can have an effect. The suggestion that Bill C-60 was a major tool in fighting the separatist movement in Quebec indicated contempt for the intelligence of Quebecers.

Let us hope that some progress will be made in this respect in the coming conference of first ministers. We should not forget that a new Constitution created in haste could be more divisive than the present situation. Let us take the time we need to properly structure our new Constitution and in the process let us not use it for sheer electoral gains.

I come now to the behaviour of the government regarding that special aspect of constitutional reform dealing with the Senate. Bill C-60 would have abolished the Senate purely and simply, and replaced it with an entirely new chamber called "The House of the Federation." The white paper gave the following reasons for this proposal:

There is a further institution of our federal system in need of major change. The Canadian Senate does not now serve the need of the Federation for a House where the full range and depth of our regional problems, and the effect of national policies on those problems, can be discussed with—

And I emphasize the words that come next.

[Senator Flynn.]

—independence and authority. The House of Commons cannot fully serve this function, as party discipline—

And I might emphasize that, too.

—under the Parliamentary system requires that a national viewpoint be adopted. The Senate, appointed as it now is entirely by the federal government, has not been able to provide that recognized forum for the achievement of genuine understanding of the sometimes conflicting natures of our national and regional objectives—and for the search for solutions.

The government believes that to meet these needs a new legislative body, the House of the Federation, should be provided for in our Constitution as a replacement for the Senate. Essential features of the new House would be the recognition of a role for the provinces in the selection of its members, and provision for proportionately greater representation to the eastern and western parts of the country, with substantial adjustment to ensure adequate representation for western Canada which, until now, has not received a share commensurate with its growing importance.

I, for one, disagree with the premise that the Senate, appointed as it now is, has been unable to provide a forum for the expression of regional aspirations. It may not have done all it should have done, but it certainly did more than is suggested in this blunt accusation of the government's.

On the matter of whether or not this proposed House of the Federation really provides a meaningful alternative to the valid criticism made of the Senate, I have grave doubts that the special committee of the Senate which dealt with this matter shares this opinion. That is a matter that can be addressed on other occasions, and in the reconstituted Special Senate Committee on the Constitution.

What I wish to underline at this time is the fact that the government has accused the Senate, and more specifically the large Liberal majority in this house, of not having discharged the duties that were assigned to this institution. It is rather ironic that the government should be making this accusation when you consider that the government supporters in this house were merely acting in the way the government expected, or, should I say, required them to act.

Senator Forsey: Not all!

Senator Flynn: Who said, "Not all!"? I should like to identify the one who claims to be impervious to government influence. Senator Forsey. Of course! And I would guess you are not alone, Senator Forsey. I wish there were more of you.

The instances in which the Senate may have failed to play its role as representative of regional interests and aspirations have involved cases where the government commanded the Senate majority not to create any difficulty by amending or delaying legislation which had ramifications on the provincial level.

The only serious criticism of the Senate has been to question its credibility because it is an appointed body rather than an elected one. The House of the Federation does not change that since its members would also be appointed for the term of a federal Parliament or a provincial legislature.

It was open to the present government and the Liberal Party, which has been in office for 39 of the last 43 years—I believe for 45 of the last 60 years—to correct the situation by changes in the quality of appointments, possibly the term of appointments, and by a slackening of party discipline. This might have resulted in meaningful reforms. I grant you that there have been some endeavours in this area, but they have been much too timid.

In any event, it will be interesting to watch this house operating under the suspended death sentence provided in Bill C-60. I will be interested to see if there is any change in the behaviour of the members who officially support the present government. As far as I am concerned, if the Senate is to be abolished, I want the alternative to be something better.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: I would also like one last chance to prove to the government that we could be more efficient if only it would let us operate freely and did not impose all these constraints on the Liberal majority.

In short, the government has never had a high opinion of the Senate, and I suggest to honourable senators that the government bears the main responsibility for our poor image in the eyes of the public. We should do everything in our power to improve that image before our demise, if demise there has to be.

At this point, I should offer my sympathy to the Leader of the Government. He has had to go through a very difficult period trying to reconcile his obligations as a member of both the administration and the Senate. But I suppose he finds himself in a better situation as a member of the Senate than in having to run in British Columbia in the next general election, with the risk of obtaining only 10 per cent of the popular vote.

The last window on the perspective of the government which I wish to open is on the economy. I do not intend to open it very wide. I need not cite many figures to assert that our economic situation is extremely serious, that since 1968 we have witnessed constant deterioration—government expenditures have multiplied four and a half times; the consumer price index has increased from 89.4 to 168.9; the purchasing power of the dollar has fallen to 52 cents. We have reached a point where our dollar is now worth less than it was at the worst time of the depression. Unemployment is two and a half times what it was; UIC benefits are close to eight times higher; there are increased budgetary deficits and increased public debt, et cetera.

The Speech from the Throne speaks of a reduction in federal spending; a reduction of the government's share of the national wealth; a reduction in the size of the Public Service; wage restraint in the public sector; elimination of excessive government intervention in the private sector, et cetera, et cetera.

If honourable senators were to read the Speech from the Throne of four years ago—or of the last session, for that matter—and compare it to the present one, they would hardly notice any difference except in the emphasis on certain general principles.

When he became Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau waged a campaign on the theme of the “Just Society,” suggesting mild government intervention in the economy. Five or so years later he spoke of the “New Society,” charging that the private sector was a failure and that there was no other solution than a more interventionist welfare state. Now, he sees a solution in the return of the “Old Society,” with less government intervention and more reliance on the private sector.

These somersaults are at the root of many of our present difficulties. The business world does not know exactly in what direction the government is moving or may move tomorrow. For instance, the Speech from the Throne says:

Expenditure restraint has been a central theme of federal policy and practice since October, 1975.

What results have we had? An increase in spending of 45 per cent. The Throne Speech goes on further to say:

In August, the Government set itself a more ambitious restraint objective. Planned—

I emphasize the word “planned.”

—federal spending this fiscal year will be reduced by five hundred million dollars, and next year's projected spending will be reduced by two billion dollars. As a result, the projected rate of expenditure growth during the next fiscal year is 8.9 per cent. That is well below the forecast growth of 11 per cent for the GNP.

Honourable senators will have noticed the words “planned federal spending,” “projected spending,” and “projected rate of expenditure.” Can anyone tell me what, in practice, that amounts to? I can't either. But one thing we are sure of is that the total expenditure for next year will be higher. That is certain. That is what the Throne Speech says.

The government will not spend as much as it would have liked to spend, but it will still spend more than last year. The government promises to abandon certain programs, but at the same time it informs us that it will shift dollars or transfer funds from low-priority to high-priority goals. Of course, the government is a master at defining which are the low-priority and which are the high-priority goals.

Let us look at them. They are not goals set over the long term, the result of a logical assessment of hard facts. They are targets hastily adopted for the sake of political expediency, at a time when the government was looking forward to a fall election. The announcements in August, after the Prime Minister returned from Bonn, his toying with the idea of a fall election, the way the government has talked to taxpayers and the business world over the past four years—all these show this government's utter disregard for the intelligence of the man in the street. But the man in the street yesterday told the government that he will not be fooled much longer.

Honourable senators will be pleased to hear that I am now reaching a conclusion. I will happily resume my seat in a few moments.

As I listened to the Speech from the Throne, I could hardly identify a single sentence that I had not heard in more or less the same terms in previous speeches; and when the next day I read in our Debates the customary phrase, "His Excellency was pleased to retire," I could not resist concluding that those words must never have been truer than on this occasion.

In any event, as we commence this last session with the consolation that it is the last I want to assure honourable senators that we in the opposition will do our very best to review and criticize objectively the legislation that the government sends us. If we are able to pass only the most important bills which died on the Order Paper, we will be accomplishing a lot.

Those bills, along with the ones promised in the Speech from the Throne, would keep Parliament in session for a lengthy period. This prospect may appeal to the Prime Minister, who is so reluctant to call a general election, which normally should have taken place by now, but I repeat that his hesitation and his governing by polls are contributing more than any other factor to the political and economic difficulties we are faced with.

I sincerely believe that only a general election will clear the air, and it is obvious that only a new government will satisfy the electorate.

On motion of Senator Perrault, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have information with respect to the measure we are expecting to receive. I have been advised that the members of the other place have stood clause 5 and are now discussing clause 6. There is a total of 11 clauses in this bill.

I suggest that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure until the call of the bell at approximately 9.45 p.m.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 12 midnight the sitting was resumed.

POSTAL SERVICES CONTINUATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-8, to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services.

Bill read first time.

[Senator Flynn.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator McIlraith: I should like to make one or two suggestions to honourable senators for their consideration.

Senator Flynn: Are you moving second reading?

Senator McIlraith: Yes. I was proposing to ask for leave to move second reading now, but in doing so I wanted to—

Senator Flynn: You should deal with the question of leave.

Senator McIlraith: That is what I was proposing to do. I now propose to ask for leave to proceed with second reading, and if the bill should be given second reading tonight I intend to ask for leave to proceed with third reading so that the bill can be given royal assent tonight. The effect of clause 11 is that this measure will come into force at 12.01 Thursday morning. The House of Commons is standing by.

Senator Flynn: Let it stand by.

Senator McIlraith: The Deputy to the Governor General is in the building and available to give royal assent. Therefore, if it commends itself to honourable senators, I would ask leave to proceed with second reading and our intention would be, if agreeable, to proceed through all stages now.

Senator Flynn: Go ahead.

Senator McIlraith: Thank you very much, honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: I understand you are asking if leave is granted. Before leave is granted, I would like some explanation from the sponsor of the bill. He tells us he wants this bill to be passed because the House of Commons is waiting. In my perspective, that is not a very good reason. The second reason is that the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General is also waiting. I did not call him, I do not know who did, but I do not think that is at all relevant.

The problem is that you are asking us, without any legal consequence, to deal with this bill after 12 o'clock midnight. It is too late now for the bill to come into force on Wednesday, and even if you obtained royal assent at two minutes before midnight, do you think it would be fair to tell the workers who are on a legal strike to go back to work within two minutes?

Is it reasonable for the Senate to discuss this bill at this late hour rather than discuss it tomorrow? I say it is ridiculous to ask us to deal with this bill at this time of night, because the practical consequences will be the same. I am very sorry for the Deputy of His Excellency. I do not see why we should be asked to grant leave.

I would like the Leader of the Government to tell us the advantage of passing this bill at this time instead of in the morning.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, it had been anticipated earlier today that it would be possible to obtain royal assent for this proposed measure by midnight tonight. However, members of the other place determined that they wished to discuss this important bill at greater length than had been anticipated. Indeed, a number of amendments were proposed.

Senator Flynn: Answer my question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, you have been given a full opportunity to express your viewpoint. Would you allow me to finish what I have to say?

● (0010)

Senator Flynn: It is too late for going around the question.

Senator Perrault: It is not too late for a logical explanation. You asked a question.

Senator Flynn: Answer it.

Senator Perrault: Would you please remain seated while an explanation is attempted?

Senator Asselin: Are you the Speaker?

Senator Smith (Colchester): Who are you?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I don't have to be reprimanded by the Leader of the Opposition when I am asked for an explanation as to why it is proposed that we attempt to obtain royal assent this evening. May I continue my explanation?

Senator Flynn: You have not come to it.

Senator Perrault: I want to say, honourable senators, that during the day I communicated with the Leader of the Opposition the time schedule involved here.

Senator Flynn: It is not relevant.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, listen to what I have to say, and perhaps you can make a judgment after I have concluded. It had been anticipated that there would be an adequate amount of time for debate in this chamber on this important measure and that we could obtain royal assent by midnight. The time schedule, for reasons beyond anyone's control, went longer than had been anticipated.

Senator Flynn: I know that.

Senator Perrault: No one seeks to breach the rules or traditions of this house or to restrict any senator's opportunity or right to debate this measure, but I suggest that today and this evening a great many people have engaged in an enormous amount of work to make passage of the bill possible.

Senator Flynn: Who?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a great many people have gone to extraordinary lengths and have worked extended hours in order to have this bill dealt with this evening. If the Leader of the Opposition does not wish to give consent to proceed, that is his decision, that is the end of the attempt, and we could proceed to debate it later this day.

Honourable senators, I reiterate the practical problem which has arisen. We had anticipated we would have this measure from the other place by 9 o'clock tonight, which would have permitted at least three hours of Senate debate, preceded, of course, by personal study of the proposed measure by a number of senators during the day. We are now approximately three hours behind that anticipated schedule—a delay beyond anyone's control. The members of the other place engaged, as is their right, in a rather protracted debate on this proposed measure. If at this time certain honourable senators do not wish to proceed, or if the Honourable Leader of the Opposition refuses to give his consent for the advancement of this bill, that is the end of the matter.

Senator Flynn: If that is the only explanation you have, I will give leave, because once again the government is trying to make a fool of the Senate.

Senator Perrault: All the honourable senator has to do is to say he is unwilling to have this measure proceed.

Senator Flynn: No, I would not want one member, or a small group here—because we are only a small group—to prevent the majority from acting. We have a responsibility in this place, and if it is the wish of the Leader of the Government, supported by the docile majority over there, then okay.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator has a right to debate this bill at length now if he wishes, or later in the day if he wishes. It is his option. Nobody wishes to restrict the right of senators to debate this measure.

Senator Flynn: I know that.

Senator Asselin: I was asked by my party to speak on this bill this evening. Because the Leader of the Government said we might be discussing the bill at 9.30 or 10 o'clock I went to the other place and listened to the debate, in which there were very good arguments put forward by some members of the House of Commons. Amendments were put forward and votes were taken on some of them. But I am not ready tonight to read over all the discussion that has taken place in the House of Commons, or study the amendments that were advanced over there.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, having been called upon to speak on behalf of the opposition on this bill, I want to do it in a conscientious manner. If however, as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, to discuss clause 11 through the night would bring us no nearer to a settlement of this issue.

● (0020)

If we decide to deal with this matter now, the law will not come into force until Thursday, because it is now past 12 o'clock midnight. Clause 11 reads:

This Act shall come into force on the day immediately following the day on which it is assented to.

So there will be no repercussions. But something could happen. The strikers could cool off. They may think overnight about what has been decided in the House of Commons, and perhaps tomorrow there could be a settlement between the Postmaster General or the Minister of Labour and the leaders of the workers.

May we not ask the Leader of the Government to take a chance and give these workers an opportunity to think about what has been decided and discussed in the House of Commons tonight, and see what happens tomorrow? I am not ready to deal with the bill tonight because I want to study the amendments and also the arguments that have been put forward in the House of Commons this evening.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, as one senator on this side of the house, I have to tell you that I support the Leader of the Opposition. In my view, it is unfair to put the Senate in this position at this hour, when it makes absolutely no difference when this particular bill becomes law.

I am very interested in this bill. I had the privilege of being a Co-Chairman of the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service, and I have a real concern about the developments that have taken place so far in the relationships between the Government of Canada and its employees. I would like to be able to understand this bill. I do not think I can do that very well if we are going to debate it from now until 3 o'clock in the morning, especially when it will not affect the end result.

I would like to suggest to the government leader that he consider this situation, and give us the opportunity to review the bill in order to be able to debate it sensibly. I think the stature of the Senate will be enhanced if we give it a much more detailed consideration and review than is possible by rushing it through at midnight.

Senator Perrault: Let me again make it clear that there is no attempt on the part of the government to rush this measure through the Senate with inordinate haste. Honourable senators may choose to debate this issue at any length they desire at this hour, or they may choose to do so later this day.

The government is proceeding only out of consideration—if honourable senators agree, and they may wish to disagree—for our colleagues in the other chamber who have worked throughout the day and who are awaiting our action, and for the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General who has been waiting for a number of hours to give royal assent.

Senator Flynn: He will go to bed early.

Senator Perrault: If honourable senators are unwilling to provide that kind of accommodation—and that is purely their decision to make—then let them decide, one member of the Senate or any group of honourable senators, that they will not give consent at this hour to the stages necessary for the passage of this measure and the granting of royal assent. There is no suggestion whatsoever that this measure has to be passed in any kind of undue haste. I do not know how many times that must be repeated.

Senator Roblin: The Leader of the Government has now thoroughly confused me. I should like to ask him a couple of questions to see whether he can straighten out my unfortunate situation.

We have been told that there is no pressure on us to depart from normal procedures with respect to this matter. That is not a point that bothers me, because I have been subject to pressure before. What I do not understand is the real reason why we are being asked to proceed with this matter now. If I understand the meaning of clause 11 of the bill, it indicates that no matter what we do now the bill will not come into force on Wednesday. That is clear. It means that no matter whether we deal with it now or later this day, it cannot come into force before Thursday.

If my interpretation of this clause is correct, and if the Honourable Leader of the Government will tell us that he has no intention of amending this particular clause so that it will come into force before Thursday, then I fail to see why we should be asked to deal with it in a rather hasty manner now. It seems to me that we can easily meet later this day, as has been suggested. I for one—and I can only speak for myself—am willing to waive any rule in order to ensure that it not be delayed beyond those few hours so that the effective date will still be Thursday.

I am puzzled as to why we are being asked to deal with this important matter now when it has no practical consequence in terms of the public interest.

I have great respect for our colleagues in the other house and for those who have been told that a certain plan of action might be contemplated. I do not wish to be awkward as far as they are concerned, but we do have a duty to ourselves and to the people of Canada to ensure that we know what we are talking about when we are deliberating this measure.

So if there is no practical consequence in dispensing with immediate action and dealing with this matter tomorrow morning, when we are refreshed and can do so a little more coherently than we can at this time, then I do not understand why we are not adopting that course. It would seem to be the better part of discretion that we do that.

As I say, my honourable friend has me thoroughly confused. I do not know why he is pushing this at this moment when there is no practical consequence to it and when there might be advantage in being able to consider the matter at some leisure.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, no one is pushing the Senate to debate this now. If I take from your remarks that you refuse to grant consent to proceed with this bill, there will be no recrimination and it will be debated later this day.

At 9 o'clock this evening there was an urgency and a reasonable expectation that the force of this measure, if given royal assent, would be felt after midnight tonight. By 11 o'clock this evening, with but an hour for debate, the possibility of passage before midnight had become marginal. A question arose whether the proposed measure could be debated and passed in time to take effect as scheduled. As I have said, the principal reason we are here at this hour is to accommodate a great number of individuals who have been severely inconvenienced. However, there will be no attempt by the government to force the Senate to debate this bill at this hour, if honourable senators do not wish to debate it. Let me be clear about that.

Perhaps the sponsor of the bill would like to add a few remarks.

Senator Roblin: If my interpretation of the impact of clause 11 of this bill is correct—

Senator Perrault: You are right.

Senator Roblin: It is agreed, then, that I am right in assuming—

Senator Perrault: That is correct. It has been stated several times.

Senator Roblin: I am glad to hear that. That is the first time it has registered with me. I am a little slow at times.

Senator Flynn: In order to save time for those who have been waiting, and in order that they may go to bed now rather than in two hours from now, I will say no.

● (0040)

Senator Langlois: You could have said that sooner.

Senator Flynn: I was trying to get some explanation.

Senator McIlraith: I thought I made it clear at the outset of my remarks that the bill would come into force at 12:01 a.m. on Thursday next.

Senator Croll: Leave has been refused, so that is the end of it.

Senator McIlraith: I realize that leave has been refused to proceed with second reading now. I merely want to confirm that leave is being granted to proceed later this day.

Senator Flynn: That's fine, later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate, it is moved by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Croll, that this bill be placed on the orders of the day for second reading later this day.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois, that the Senate do now adjourn until 11.00 o'clock in the forenoon this day.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 11 a.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 18, 1978

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

HIS HOLINESS POPE JOHN PAUL II

FELICITATIONS ON ELECTION

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, it was with great jubilation and surprise that the world received an announcement on October 16 last that the cardinals of the Roman Catholic Church, in an historic conclave, had elected, in succession to Pope John Paul I, a new pope in the person of Karol Cardinal Wojtyla, Archbishop of Krakow, Poland, where, in 1966, with many of my parliamentary colleagues in a delegation commemorating the one thousandth anniversary of Christianity in Poland, we witnessed the inspiring religious devotion, the deep, flourishing faith and religious tradition of the people. A staunch defender of religious freedom and human rights, the new Pope chose the name of John Paul II, recognizing the achievements of his two illustrious predecessors.

Canada was honoured by the two visits Pope John Paul II, as Cardinal Wojtyla, made to our country in 1969 and 1976, when many Canadians had the privilege of meeting him and being edified by his many qualities. We who had the pleasure of speaking to His Holiness were greatly inspired and fortified in the faith. Christians and members of many faiths have joined in extending best wishes to the new Pontiff of the Roman Catholic Church. I should like to associate myself with these tributes.

Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable John J. Connolly, that the Honourable the Speaker convey the felicitations and the prayers of the Senate of Canada to His Holiness, Pope John Paul II, with the fervent wish that his pontificate may be blessed in the service of men of good will everywhere.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.
Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of Reports of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76, respecting certain compensation plans, as follows:

1. Libby, McNeill & Libby of Canada Limited, Chatham, Ontario and the group of its Chatham plant employees represented by the International Union,

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if he does not feel in better form to deal with the emergency legislation at this time than he would have earlier this morning?

Senator Langlois: He is always in good form.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only echo what has been expressed by our deputy leader. I always attempt to be in good form.

Senator Flynn: Dangerously well.

Senator Perrault: I do think it may be worthwhile clarifying briefly, especially for the media, the situation last night and early this morning. I want to emphasize that even had we passed Bill C-8 last night or early this morning it could not have gone into effect until tomorrow. Therefore, the suggestion that somehow the Senate has delayed this measure of vital importance to Canadians everywhere is not true, it is not accurate. I hope that correct view can be conveyed to the Canadian people.

Senator Argue: A big lie.

Senator Perrault: The only option open to us after midnight was merely an option that might have accommodated a great many people who had worked for many, many hours, and were standing by to assure passage, assent to and implementation of the bill. No harm has been done. This was an initiative by the government to try to accommodate the people who were standing by, including the representative of His Excellency the Governor General. So let us carry on in a positive and co-operative fashion and make certain that the bill is given the attention it deserves.

Senator Flynn: I think I should be allowed to make a little correction. If the Leader of the Government had said last night what he is saying now the media would not have misunderstood the situation. That is the first point. The second is with regard to the accommodation of many people. I think the Commons were very happy to go to bed earlier than at 4 o'clock this morning and that goes for the representative of the Governor General also.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT PRICE AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA RESPECTING CRUDE OIL—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if the government considers the agreement it made with Alberta respecting the dates for changing the price of crude oil to be a firm commitment, or does the government feel this is still negotiable?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice.

FISHERIES

GOVERNMENT ACTION AFFECTING FISHERMEN IN ATLANTIC CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question having to do with the fishermen in Atlantic Canada. In view of the continuing fears about a definitive decision by the government, first, concerning the future of the fisheries research laboratory in Halifax, secondly, closing the weather station at Gander, and thirdly, the cut-back of marine broadcasting, even though there has been some representation otherwise, could the leader extract from the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment a definitive decision on the government's intentions?

Senator Perrault: That explanation will be sought from the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Representations with respect to all three of those subjects are under study at the present time.

GREAT LAKES SHIPPING

STRIKE OF ENGINEERS AND DECK OFFICERS—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, last night great anxiety was expressed in the house by some members from western Canada and elsewhere about the state of the strike in the Great Lakes shipping system and its effect on the economy of the country, and on western Canada in particular. Can the Leader of the Government give us any information on the present status of that industrial dispute, and whether the government has a plan of action to deal with it?

Senator Perrault: We have no further information this morning, except for confirmation of the fact that Upper Lakes Shipping has signed an agreement. Hopefully, information can be obtained during the next few hours if there are further developments.

Senator Argue: How many ships are involved?

Senator Perrault: I understand there are something like 126.

Senator Argue: The ones that have settled.

Senator Perrault: Approximately 25.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CLOSURE OF REGINA WEATHER STATION—QUESTION

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question. I am sorry that I have not been able to give him notice of it. It results from the government restraint program and a project to save $200,000 in a year by, in effect, closing the Regina Weather Station. I just wanted to point out that this weather station was obtained in Regina after many years of battle to get it there. We feel, as the major grain-growing province in Canada, that we really need up-to-date weather information, and it is not good enough that the weather information comes from Winnipeg and Edmonton only.

This is a major issue. It may not sound too important. It is only $200,000, which in the context of a huge budget is not very much. But it is so great an issue that all political parties in Saskatchewan campaigning in the election for today have said that they, as a government, would be prepared to pick up the tab. But I suggest that there is no reason why Saskatchewan should pick up the tab if Alberta is not picking up the tab and if Manitoba is not picking up the tab. We from Saskatchewan feel that this is something of major importance.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, the government is aware of the concern which exists in the prairie provinces with respect to this particular weather station. The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment has spoken about this and other matters on occasion. He has stated that technological advances in weather forecasting have resulted in proposals to centralize certain of them, to relocate in the case of certain other facilities. However, if the honourable senator has information which should be brought to the attention of the minister, I would be pleased to assist in conveying that information to the minister.

Senator Argue: I would be very delighted to do that; and I think the information I have brought this morning is accurate.

Senator Perrault: I may say that in recent weeks members of the loyal opposition have spoken, both in the other place and in various parts of Canada, in terms of the alleged illusory nature of government cut-backs. I think we have had a great deal of evidence in recent days that these cut-backs are far from being illusory: they are very tangible and very real.

Senator Argue: I am not debating that point.

Senator Flynn: It is a high priority.

POSTAL SERVICES CONTINUATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill C-8, to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services.

He said: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: You have a good audience today.

Senator McIlraith: I hope a well rested one.

Senator Grosart: Representative.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, Canada's industrial relations system reflects our belief that it works well and can be protected and promoted through free collective bargaining as the means for settling labour-management disputes.

Our laws have established the framework of rights and responsibilities in which management and labour are to conduct their relations, and it places the responsibility for resolving labour-management disputes clearly on the parties to the collective bargaining. That is the basis of our system as I see it.

Unfortunately, there are times when the necessary spirit of compromise and the demonstration of good faith that are required are found wanting, for whatever reason. As a result, the government, which clearly has the responsibility to the community at large to protect the public interest, must act. This is the case in the situation before us today, and this is why we are bringing forward the bill dealing with the dispute between the Post Office and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

It is, I think, the view of most senators that Parliament must legislate to prevent the continuation of this stoppage of postal services.

It is clear from a review of developments leading up to the present impasse between the inside postal workers and management that there has been a complete lack of meaningful communication and dialogue between the parties, and almost no real bargaining; that is, the necessary compromises and counterproposals on which a viable collective agreement and bargaining relationship can be based have been absent.

The previous collective agreement between the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and the Treasury Board expired on June 30, 1977. In the early months of 1977 several pre-negotiation meetings took place between the parties, without any progress being made. On May 4, 1977, the union served formal notice to bargain, with Treasury Board replying on May 6, 1977. The first formal meeting, which took place on May 19, 1977, lasted one hour and was the only one for several months.

Following a number of unsuccessful attempts by the Post Office to resume talks, negotiations were finally held again in October and November. However, little progress was made.

On November 30, 1977, the employer filed an application with the Public Service Staff Relations Board for the appointment of a Conciliation Board. Mr. Roy Heenan, on behalf of management, Mr. Irving Gaul, on behalf of the union, were named to the Conciliation Board on December 17, 1977. Mr. Louis Courtemanche was appointed chairman of the board on February 2, 1978.

There were many public conciliation hearings from April through July, 1978. Closed conciliation sessions involving both parties began on July 18, 1978, and continued through to the end of the month. During these extensive Conciliation Board proceedings, the parties were able to agree to only a few minor clauses.

The employer met separately with the Conciliation Board on July 27 and 31, 1978, and on five occasions in August. On August 16, 1978, the union gave notice that it wished the conciliation process to terminate and asked the board to prepare its report.

The Conciliation Board handed down three separate reports which were released to the parties on October 6, 1978. The lack of agreement by the three members of the Conciliation Board are an indication of the intense feelings of the parties and the wide differences between them on a very large number of complex contract items. Notwithstanding the very exhaustive efforts of the Conciliation Board from April to August, 1978, little was achieved in bringing the parties closer to agreement, and since the handing down of the three separate board reports, it is apparent that very wide gaps between the parties still exist.

Honourable senators, you will have learned that on Monday the Acting Minister of Labour and senior officials from the Department of Labour made what is called "a last ditch effort" to resolve this dispute in a spirit of conciliation and compromise when they met extensively throughout the day and late into the evening with representatives of the union along with a representative of the Canadian Labour Congress in order to explore all possible avenues leading to a settlement.

Following many hours of exploratory talks, the minister proposed two possible means of resolving the dispute, and these proposals were tabled with the parties for their consideration.

The first proposal called for the application of the mediation-arbitration process in the resolution of the dispute. That process would involve the agreement by the parties to refer the dispute to a mediator-arbitrator who would seek to mediate all outstanding issues originally referred by the Public Service Staff Relations Board to the Conciliation Board chaired by Mr. Courtemanche. This process would also require the parties to further agree that the mediator, should he not be successful in mediating the whole of the collective agreement, then make an arbitration finding on all remaining unresolved issues. The parties would agree to be bound by the arbitration awards rendered. The mediator in this process would be appointed by the Acting Minister of Labour and would submit his report to the parties not later than 90 days following the date of his appointment.

The second proposal put forward by the minister would require that the employer and CUPW return to the bargaining table with full authority to settle the issues under the auspices of a special commissioner appointed by the minister to mediate the dispute. The issues to be dealt with would be those that were referred by the Public Service Staff Relations Board to the Conciliation Board chaired by Mr. Courtemanche.

The Commissioner would be required to attempt a resolution of all such issues within two weeks of his appointment. If at the end of the two-week period any issues remained unresolved, the Commissioner would then report to the Minister of Labour, stating, in his opinion, what further steps or procedures would be required to reach a final agreement.

Both of these proposals that were presented to the parties on Monday evening would also include the stipulation that, during either of the processes accepted by the parties, the union would agree to withhold any strike authorization and direct its members to return to work forthwith and to cease any work stoppage activity.

It should also be pointed out that the Assistant Deputy Minister of Labour and the minister met with the president of the union and with an Executive Vice-President of the Canadian Labour Congress on Friday, October 13, in an effort to foster acceptance of the proposed voluntary procedure of mediation-arbitration for the resolution of the dispute. Unfortunately, the National Executive Board for the union rejected both these proposals for the resolution of the dispute, and called a national strike Monday night.

It will be seen that every effort has been made to resolve the dispute through a negotiated settlement in a spirit of conciliation and compromise. It appears that there are now only two courses left open to the government: either allow the work stoppage to continue with no hope of settlement available to the parties, or legislate an end to the work stoppage and bring about a resumption of postal operations while providing for the resolution of the dispute.

It is evident that serious socio-economic consequences of this work stoppage now make it very clear that, in the interests of all Canadians, prompt and decisive legislative action should take place. Hence, Bill C-8 that is before us now.

I assume that most honourable senators have by now had an opportunity of reading the bill, and I am sure most senators followed its course through the other place yesterday. Regrettably, the debate there took longer than was anticipated.

The bill, in most respects, is similar to earlier bills of this type. It provides for the continuation of postal operations, making the present work stoppage illegal. The appointment of the mediator-arbitrator is not in the same form as we find it in many previous bills. The person to be appointed will adopt the two roles, that of mediator and that of arbitrator.

The term of the new collective agreement to which the bill applies is extended until December 31, 1979. The Public Service Staff Relations Act is made applicable to the mediation-arbitration proceedings. I have some doubt in my own mind as to whether it is required to be made applicable, because it may be applicable in any event. At any rate, the effect of making certain sections of the Public Service Staff Relations Act applicable is to clear up any doubt that there may be on that point, to counteract any argument that may be made to the contrary, and to make it clear that the function of the mediator-arbitrator is regulated by the relevant clauses of the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Honourable senators, when we come to the clauses dealing with offences and penalties we realize that some of the earlier legislation provided for much lighter penalties than those provided for in this legislation, but I would point out that the penalties set out in this bill are based on recommendations contained in the report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Labour Relations in the Public Service. The penalties recommended by that committee in its report presented a year or so ago have been adopted.

Honourable senators, without further ado, I commend the bill to your favourable consideration.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I listened very carefully to what Senator McIlraith said this morning in moving the second reading of this bill. He has not said anything new. We heard the same argument this morning that we heard in the past when we were asked by the government to deal with emergency legislation of this kind.

I think the main point to be raised this morning is the fact that the right to strike granted to these workers by this government is now being removed. But why single them out? Why take the right away from this group only? The government is trying to play on both sides of the fence. It is trying to pretend it is the great defender of the working man, and so to all public servants it has extended the right to strike. But the moment things go wrong, and the government is likely to be criticized because of yet another strike in the public service, that right is temporarily removed. Why doesn't the government come clean? Why, honourable senators, doesn't it decide once and for all whether it wants to continue to give civil servants the right to strike?

This government, obsessed as it is with the fear of losing power, can only measure its actions in terms of votes. There are votes to be gained from being an open-minded administration that allows civil servants to strike, and there are votes also to be gained from forcing people back to work. But that is not fair to these workers. They are being used, and they are entitled now to know precisely where they stand. Because another strike in this essential service will deal a further blow to an economy that is already crippled as a result of chronic mismanagement on the part of this government, we on this side are forced to support this legislation. But we do so, as I will point out later, with some reservations.

I think another vehicle must be found either to avoid completely these disputes that lead to strikes, or to handle them more efficiently and effectively if they do arise. The fact, honourable senators, that there have been some 60 major public service disputes in the last eight years, and the fact that eight of those have required this type of emergency legislation, are obvious indications that it is time we seriously considered setting up a body which would make sure that negotiations were entered into long before a contract nears its termination date. Such a body could also oversee these negotiations to make sure that they were running smoothly. The idea is that we must take the necessary steps to avoid strikes. We simply cannot afford them now.

This government has shown itself to be a bad employer. Its employees are certainly not satisfied with the way they are treated. If I may repeat myself, 60 major public service disruptions in eight years is nothing to brag about. It is obvious that the administration just cannot handle properly the delicate negotiations that exist with its hired help. That is not surprising, honourable senators, since this government does not seem to be able to handle successfully anything that requires more than a minimum of skill.

So we need a body that will help this administration, in the few months it has left to it, to govern this country; and that is what this government should work towards establishing the minute we have passed this legislation.

We suggested that the postal workers be denied the right to walk out. We said this a long time ago. We made the suggestion because our economy at the present time cannot afford this type of strike.

However, we do not like to see workers forced back to work, and we deplore the state of affairs which allows disagreements to degenerate to the point where a strike seems to be the only option left for a group of workers. On the other hand, we have a responsibility to the rest of Canada, to what is left of the health of our economy.

The blame, honourable senators, is on the government for allowing such situation to develop. We do what we must for the good of the country, but sympathize with these workers, whose employer is known for its incompetence.

[Senator Asselin.]

[Translation]

Honourable senators, it is unbelievable that, as stated by the mover of the bill, this group of workers, the postal workers, have been without a collective agreement since 1977. And since 1977 this government has found no formula for a satisfactory agreement with the 23,000 postal workers.

In almost every center across the country, the union brought to the government's attention a large number of complaints about automation, a large number of work grievances, but they all remained unanswered and unsolved, no decision whatsoever being taken by the government representatives on the grievances filed with the employer.

It is no surprise therefore that these workers' attitude is one of hassle and defiance, because work conditions have been deteriorating for much too long. Further, there has been nothing forthcoming, and I repeat nothing except the Moisan Report, tabled under Mr. Mackasey. That report attempted to submit solutions to the government and both parties, but these did not go through.

I was shocked last week by what I would call the premature attitude of the head of government who suggested, even before the strike began, that he would have a special law enacted. Imagine, Parliament would enact a special law if employees exercised their legal right to strike. He even threatened to do away with the right to strike in the public service. That on the part of the head of the government was not an attempt to arrive at a negotiated solution but, in my opinion, purely and simply a provocation to those 23,000 employees.

So is it surprising, honourable senators, that the union should feel deeply annoyed and say publicly that it is possible in the circumstances that the emergency legislation might be disobeyed? Last night on the radio news I heard the president of the union, Mr. Parrot, say that he might advise his 23,000 employees not to obey the special legislation. Of course, nobody in this house would agree with such a decision by the president of the union but I think it reflects the state of mind that exists among the leadership and the postal employees at this time.

The question we are asking now is: Do they have the right to use a policy of confrontation that will undoubtedly incite the employees to disobey a legislation of Parliament, because they do not want to lose face, because they also want to keep a minimum of the privileges they won in the past year and a half from the government and its representatives?

What I find ridiculous in the process of negotiations and attempted settlements of this conflict is that even before those employees could use their right to strike legally, even before they could use an act voted by the Parliament of Canada allowing them to strike legally, after the required periods have expired, they introduced an emergency legislation and immediately said: You are not going to use the legal right to strike that Parliament gave you; you are going to go back to work.

We have enacted special legislation similar to this bill in the past but with the difference that we let the postal employees or the union membership first use their legal right to strike obtained legally through legislation passed by Parliament. Furthermore, when Parliament realized afterwards that that right to strike had been abused, that an extended illegal strike was threatening the economy of the country, it decided to pass legislation to limit the dire economic consequences of an extended illegal strike.

This is not the case today. Today, we will be passing legislation almost immediately after a right to strike legally has been gained by a group of workers and that right has hardly been used yet. Even before they can use this right to call a legal strike, we pass a law to tell them: "No, you will not do it. The strike may be legal, but we are taking back the right that we had previously given to you by an act of Parliament."

I therefore wonder about the logic of the decision of Parliament as concerns the legal right to strike of public service employees. Of course, the government will say that we cannot delay passage of this legislation since an extended strike will have disastrous economic repercussions. On the other hand, we are, of course, responsible people and we are ready to cooperate to hasten as much as possible passage of this legislation.

However, we also want to use our right as the official opposition to tell the government that it is wrong to apply special legislation to people who have just started in the last few days to use their legal right to strike. I feel that we are provoking these employees and that our position will become more uncomfortable in a few days if these people decide not to obey the special legislation we are about to pass. It would not be surprising if another bill were introduced Friday to ask the employees on strike to obey the law passed today.

Honourable senators, I believe we must reflect seriously before giving the green light to this bill which, in my opinion, can in no way solve the present problem.

The sponsor of the bill said that the legislation provides for the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator who will be fully empowered to discuss and solve existing problems between postal employees and their employer, the federal government. However, this method has already been used without success by the government. If we read carefully the Moisan report on wages and automation problems, we may wonder what terms of reference the government can give to this mediator-arbitrator so that he may enjoy all the authority needed to discuss either the wage problems, the employment security problems or the automation problems of postal workers. I think that, at the present time, those are the major problems about which there is disagreement.

Honourable senators, I know that some of my colleagues want to discuss this important bill, but I believe that if the government really wanted to make an effort and show its goodwill—and I must repeat that those people have not had a collective agreement since June 1977—the government would try, as we have suggested, to find a satisfactory temporary formula to solve the problems which oppose it to the postal workers.

I do not believe that this mediator-arbitrator can be given all the authority needed to be able to bring both parties to an agreement and to find satisfactory solutions to what I consider as the very serious problems now facing postal workers within the time limit set in this bill.

[English]

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the sponsor of the bill one question. Does he propose to refer the bill to a committee, or to deal with it in Committee of the Whole, if and when it receives second reading in this chamber?

Senator McIlraith: In answer to the honourable senator, it is my intention to propose to the house that we deal with the bill in Committee of the Whole, and that we invite the Minister of Labour, under our rules, to come and answer such questions as honourable senators may wish to put to him.

Senator Molson: Thank you.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I am pleased that the government has wasted no time in bringing this legislation before Parliament. In a previous strike the country had to wait weeks before action was taken. Therefore, I think we can commend the government for this kind of forthright action. However, I am wondering whether, if this bill is passed, we will be back in the future with these same employees in exactly the same situation unless something very fundamental is done about the Post Office.

It has been announced that the Post Office is going to be made into a crown corporation. I do not know what that will do, in a practical sense, to the operation of the Post Office, but I feel, unless something very fundamental is done, we will be back in exactly the same position in future years. What is required is a study of the possibility of making a fundamental change in the operation of the Post Office. It seems to me—and I say this with great sincerity—that the government should be studying the whole question of industrial democracy and a new approach to industrial relations, including those in the Post Office.

I can see that the Post Office could be operated more efficiently without strikes, and without the almost permanent threat of strikes, if it were broken down into units that could be handled rather independently of the whole system. If that were done, the postal employees should then be taken into the confidence of the postal organization, and the postal authorities should endeavour to have a contract, on a unit basis, for the operation of a particular unit of the Post Office. It could be divided, for example, into five or six regions, and the employees should be given a voice in its operation. This theory could be applied to many industries in this country.

If this kind of contract were entered into with employees of the Post Office in a particular area or a particular region, the employees would have an incentive for improved production and for increased efficiency. I can see a contract being made between the postal authorities and the employees in a given region to provide the employees with a certain payment, which could be so much per letter or so much per article being processed. Then, if those employees organized themselves in such a way as to put through the required quantity of mail in less than an eight-hour or a six-hour day they would have the same take-home pay.

I would like to see, not only in the Post Office but in many of the big industrial concerns in this country, the employees given a say in the operation of the industry and a share of the profits. Until rank and file Canadians are given some kind of responsibility in the work that they perform, I can see this kind of situation continuing year after year.

Senator Flynn: Do you want them to share in the deficit also?

Senator Argue: You can make jokes, but I think this kind of fundamental thinking should be applied to the Post Office.

Industrial democracy is not something new, but it would be pretty new to Canada. It is not supported by the great trade union movement generally. They are afraid that it is another way for the bosses to get at the unions. It is an important concept that has brought a measure of success to the industries of such countries as Germany, Sweden and Yugoslavia. I feel that this is an area which should be considered and studied by the government. I speak as someone who believes in fundamental private enterprise. I believe in an employee's having a say in the industry in which he works, and if he can obtain a share of the returns of that industry, that is so much to the good.

Honourable senators, we are dealing with Bill C-8, which is a bill to put the striking employees of the Post Office back to work. I said I was pleased that the government had undertaken such forthright action in this field, but I am sorry that the government has not taken the same kind of forthright action to deal with the shipping strike on the Great Lakes.

It is obviously important that the mails go through, but a lot of Canadians would say that their worries would be over for a week or two—if the strike lasted that long—because their creditors would not be after them; they would not receive their worrisome mail, and they can pick up their pay cheques in any event. However, the grain producers in western Canada are threatened with a loss of $450 million before freeze-up. That is $3,000 for each individual grain producer in western Canada, and that loss is important to them. It is not just $3,000 lost today and that is the end of it. Canada is ruining its reputation with its customers because it does not deliver the wheat. We have the wheat and we have made the sales—the Canadian Wheat Board is doing a marvellous job in selling wheat—but when it comes to delivering the wheat to the customers, our record is abysmally bad.

The government is concerned about the state of the Canadian dollar. The government is having the Bank of Canada increase interest rates to try to strengthen the dollar. The government has provided for billions of dollars of loans to try to strengthen the Canadian dollar. The loss resulting from the shipping strike is not a potential loss; it is a loss of something like half a billion dollars that is starting to take place, and can take place in the next few weeks, yet we are not asked to deal with that strike.

I say that we should have Bill C-8 which is now before us, but I also say that we should have a Bill C-9 dealing with the Great Lakes shipping strike. I can see no reason why that particular strike does not warrant the same kind of attention that is being given to the postal strike.

We talk about regional alienation. The people of western Canada will tell you that if the Steel Company of Canada was affected by this strike, something would be done; and that if Ontario Hydro was threatened, something would be done. However, the newspapers tell us that the Steel Company of Canada has enough ore and coal to carry on for a few months, and Ontario Hydro has enough coal to carry on until spring. If the government is talking, as it does so often, about regional alienation, then I suggest this is a prize example of why there is alienation on the prairies.

I do not know why, and I cannot understand why, this kind of forthright action is not taken with respect to the shipping strike. The government takes it now with the postal strikers, but it must feel that the shipping strike involves only the prairie farmers and that they do not have to be tough on labour consistently—they will be tough with the Post Office employees, but they will be easy with the employees involved in the Great Lakes shipping strike.

My statement today, honourable senators, is that the government should go forward and take immediate action to solve this shipping strike. For God's sake, let us hold our wheat markets; let us supply our customers; let the farmers get the money that rightfully belongs to them; and let the country have the strength that comes from these hundreds of millions of dollars of foreign currency that the wheat producers are earning.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I want to make only a few remarks. I mentioned yesterday that I had had the privilege of being Co-Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service of Canada which reported about two years ago, and whose report will, I presume, eventually result in legislation to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act. As co-chairman of that committee, I feel that I should like to say a word or two about the whole situation that has developed, as I was able to gain some insight, as a result of many months of hearings, into the workings of the relationship between the Government of Canada and its employees.

I was impelled to rise because of the rather sanctimonious presentation of Senator Asselin, representing the opposition point of view, in which he derided the government for acting too hastily—in other words, for giving the right to strike and then taking it away before there was any chance to reach a settlement. I noted the honourable senator as saying, "We don't like to see workers forced back to work." I would have liked at that point to ask him what he would have done if he had been a member of the government—Heaven forbid!—faced with this particular situation. If he had responded honestly, as I am sure he would have, he would have said, "Yes, I think our government would have had to act in the same way."

I would remind Senator Asselin that in the report of the committee, which was accepted unanimously by members of his party, the following was said:

Your Committee concluded that where the activities of the parties engaged in collective bargaining do not adversely affect the public interest, the collective bargaining process should be free to operate without intervention.

With that we would all agree.

But when the public interest becomes adversely affected, Government and Parliament should be prepared to intervene.

That is exactly what has happened, and that is a situation that has been accepted by the members of his party who served on the committee. I think the only adverse vote in the committee was by an NDP member, who did not support this particular report.

I say that only to indicate the complexity of this kind of situation. I admire the government for moving quickly in what could become a serious national disaster. I take the opportunity of this occasion to ask the members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers to obey the law, which will ask them to return to work. I hope that they respond co-operatively to this measure.

We have had evidence, even in our committee, of unlawful activity. Mr. Davidson, at that time the president of the union, appeared before the committee and indicated that he himself had called an illegal strike, but he went on to say that he did not want to act in an illegal way.

As I have indicated, I take this opportunity to plead with the members of the postal union to return to work and not try to develop a confrontation which would seriously affect labour relations throughout the whole country. At this time we are going through a very difficult period, with the termination of the AIB, when muscles are being flexed by employee groups and by management groups. We have to keep very cool during this transition period in order to bring ourselves sensibly and sanely through these difficulties. Having said that, I hope this bill will receive quick passage, and that the strikers will return to work.

In conclusion, may I just say that I feel the time has come when the government should be reviewing employer-employee relations again. There are many changed circumstances since the time our committee reported; there are new influences and there are new pressures. A new committee may come up with exactly the same conclusions. As you will recall, one of our major recommendations was to support the right to strike, because it seemed to have worked in the public service. That recommendation was agreed to by all the members of the committee. I think that has to be reviewed, not with the idea of removing the right to strike but with the objective of making it even more workable. As a committee we were concerned about illegal strikes and, as a result, suggested action by the government to increase the penalties, which suggestion is being reflected in this bill. As I say, these proposals were supported unanimously by all members of the committee except an NDP member. I hope the government will consider the establishment of a committee such as we had two years ago to take another look at the difficulties that prevail in employer-employee relations in the country today.

STRIKE OF ENGINEERS AND DECK OFFICERS

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with respect to the Great Lakes shipping dispute, to which reference has also been made in the debate on the Postal Services Continuation Bill, with leave I would like to inform the Senate that I have just been advised by the Acting Minister of Labour that both sides in the Great Lakes shipping dispute have been called to Ottawa this afternoon in an effort to find a solution. The meeting will take place at 2 o'clock this afternoon with senior officials of the Department of Labour. Furthermore, the minister states that, if necessary, he is prepared to intervene personally in order to assist a settlement of this very serious dispute.

Senator Grosart: At this point it might be appropriate to remind honourable senators that that possibility was anticipated by the Leader of the Opposition last night, when he suggested that this might be a very good and sound reason, in the public interest, for delaying our consideration, and certainly passage, of the Postal Services Continuation Bill until today.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to thank the Leader of the Government for a very encouraging announcement. I was about to commence my speech on Bill C-8 with some words of support and appreciation of the appeal made by Senator Argue in respect of the Great Lakes shipping strike. I wish the government and the other parties well in their endeavour to settle this dispute this afternoon.

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the debate on the motion of Senator McIlraith for second reading of Bill C-8, to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I thank the sponsor of the bill for a fair and factual statement of the immediate events that surround its introduction. In dealing with what is necessarily a distasteful but undoubtedly necessary bill, the words that must obviously come to mind are, "What a hell of a way to run a post office."

I have been assured by the parliamentary authorities on this side of the house—and I suppose that means Senator Gro-sart—that this expression is perfectly parliamentary because he maintains that what it lacks in elegance, it makes up in vigour. Regardless of that, I think it expresses the truth. This is not a good way to run the Post Office. I suggest the general public would agree with the sentiment. I am sure the postal workers would agree with the sentiment, although I have a suspicion that the government's views are perhaps not quite so straightforward. But this is not an occasion for an extended disquisition on the problems of the Post Office in past decades, nor am I the man to give it. But I suggest it is an occasion perhaps for some sober second thoughts about the problem at hand, which might fit the character of this institution.

It seems to me that one of the principal observations that might be made with respect to this situation is that one thing we learn from experience is that we learn very little from experience. The recent history of the Post Office over the past 10 years is well known. We can hardly count on the fingers of both hands the number of Postmasters General we have had. The number of studies is a matter of dispute, probably reaching a score or so. Management changes have been frequent. According to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce's calculation, disputes in the postal service in the period from 1971 to 1976 have amounted to a total of 110 racking confrontations in that public service. We have a picture of a ramshackle organization, reminiscent of the one-horse shay: an organization, in the minds of some, that has had a reputation, a long history, as a Victorian industrial structure, attempting in these last few years—and perhaps this is the root of all the present troubles—to undertake a most sophisticated industrial task of introducing a new high technology to employees who have long been accustomed to manual operations and to labour-intensive conditions in the industry in which they serve. Everyone who has had anything to do with industrial relations recognizes this as a difficult problem to master successfully.

It has always struck me as extraordinary that this task in staff relations, to say nothing of the general problems of running an institution like the Post Office, should be carried out by an organization which seems to be curiously split with respect to responsibility, with respect to money, and with respect to policy. We have the people who are operating the Post Office living in a world of their own. When they get into problems with unions and talk about money, they have to go to the Treasury Board, another body that has no direct managerial responsibility, to find a solution, and on that question is superimposed the responsibilities of the cabinet to deal with policy in connection with the Post Office. When you take such a disorganized industrial structure, which would bring some trepidation to the heart of the stoutest manager, and you add to it the right to strike, as we have done, you have what I think is a guaranteed mixture for an explosion.

As a result of this situation, I contend that we have seen a decade of discontent—discontent among the general public and discontent among the staff. We see an institution which is going to run a deficit of some $600 million this year. In the last few years it has invested a billion dollars—that is a large sum of money—in new plant and equipment in order to modernize and become more efficient. Yet, according to calculations I have seen, it has actually achieved, with the investment of a billion dollars and the expenditure of all that time and effort, a decline in the efficiency of its operation—as measured by the number of pieces of mail moved per person in the Post Office—that amounts to 25 per cent.

Nobody who has to pay any attention to the bottom line would survive that kind of situation very long. So we have Bill C-8, and I suggest that it is a declaration of managerial bankruptcy on the part of the executive branch of the Government of Canada, and I think it is being interpreted by the workers of the Post Office as a declaration of war. Both sides are digging themselves in for a lengthy struggle.

The bill is a band-aid, and nothing more than that. It may very well strain the bonds of civil obedience, which has been referred to already in this debate, and it certainly provides no solution to the problems that confront us.

There is a ray of hope. In the Throne Speech we are referred to the possibility of a crown corporation. That is being waved around these days as a solution. That solution has been around for some time. I think it was in 1969 that the matter was first proposed. It does hold some promise of reform to the structure of the Post Office organization so that we can look forward to some degree of unity, of responsibility, of authority, of administration, of power in channels of authority, but we must recognize that it will still not be free from cabinet policies with respect to subsidies, postal rates, level of service and matters such as that.

The point I would like to make with respect to the crown corporation is that we must be careful that we do not look upon a piece of legislation as some magic cure to the problems that we are facing. The name may be different, but the people may very well be the same. There is no guarantee that a crown corporation, by itself, is going to produce any miracles. Indeed, there are several questions we have to ask ourselves in our approach to the problem of reorganizing the Post Office. One example is: What is the job worth? In my opinion, that is a question that has never been answered satisfactorily. We know what the union thinks it is worth, and we know what the government thinks it is worth. This is not an area in which a reasonable bargaining position is normally constructed because there do not apply to it the same sanctions that apply to ordinary private disputes between union and management. What is the job worth? We need some independent evidence on that question.

How are we going to reconcile the men and women in the Post Office to the problem of modernization? If we think that today, with this $1 billion investment in machines that are going to read numbers that we put on the bottom of letters, and expedite the handling of mail in that way—if we think that is a revolution in the handling of mail, what is going to happen when the electronic experts get hold of us? I suggest to this chamber that over the course of the next 10 years there will be remarkable changes to the means of communication now regarded as a postal service. If we have trouble in this situation today, what is it going to be like when the electronic experts produce their miracles in the future? How are we going to restore union confidence and worker confidence in the good faith of the Post Office management, and the good faith of the government, with respect to their jobs because that, I suggest, is probably one of the great problems facing the Post Office at this time.

There is no climate of confidence between the parties—particularly on the union's side—with respect to the question of job security. How can you expect any man who faces the prospect of being displaced by a machine to not be concerned? It has been a program in industrial relations, as we know, since the industrial revolution began.

How can we get the management of this new structure to treat the workers in the Post Office as fellow workers? How can we induce some degree of industrial leadership, which we are entitled to expect from the management of an organization of this size? How can we get them out of the trenches and to abandon this attitude of industrial confrontation which many of us hoped had disappeared from the labour scene?

Bill C-8 is not going to help us much with this. It is an unhappy augury for continued troubles unless something serious is attempted. It is the climax of 10 years of failure to make an impression on the problems that we have been facing, and 18 months without a union agreement. If the crown corporation idea comes to fruition, I have some hopes for it because it does provide one very important thing. It provides a new chance, a fresh opportunity, an opportunity to bring the postal workers within the charmed circles of modern industrial relations which would end the problems we are experiencing now. To establish a new crown corporation with the same people, with no new policies or no new efforts to deal with the human side of this question, is not a very promising proposition in my point of view.

As a pre-condition to this sort of thing, we need to work out rules of conduct that will apply to both management and labour in this new structure so that our present problems are minimized. If we wish to see the Luddites off the premises, we must make sure that there are preventative measures which deal with the question of job security; and we must ensure that there is prior consultation and an honest effort put forth to reduce these points of friction so that the quality of service that the country needs and pays for is restored.

Many members of this chamber have more experience than I have in industrial relations. I must admit that my experience in dealing with problems within the public service and staff relations therein is relatively limited compared to other members of this chamber. However, I must say that when I was active in this field it was in a situation where there were no strike allowances made in the public service.

In my experience I did learn a thing or two. One is that if you treat people as equals and with respect, it is surprising how far they will come to meet you in finding a common solution. I found that if people are challenged with responsibility, the odds are good they will make an effective response. I also found that if there is an open-door between management and senior labour people, many problems which might otherwise blow up into matters of difficulty and concern may be solved in an amicable and friendly fashion. I hope that if the crown corporation comes into being, it might be inspired by an attitude such as this so that we can bring all parties to a more friendly and constructive frame of mind.

It is quite useless for some of us to say that we are fed up, and I suppose the Prime Minister is among those who say that. However, the public is not interested in whether we are fed up. They want to know what we are going to do about this. In my view the government has hesitated, temporized, fumbled and procrastinated with this issue long enough. If the Senate does pass this bill, and I for one am going to vote for it, I hope it will be on the clear condition that we expect the administration—which up to the present time is still in charge—to produce a radical and effective reform that will get Canada's mail moving regularly, economically and on time.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I do not intend to discuss the bill at length or speak about collective bargaining. My views on that subject have been known for years. However, there are two things that trouble me. I was present early this morning when we adjourned, but when I awoke this morning and heard the news I wondered whether I had been here or not. The first thing I heard was that the Senate had stopped the passage of the bill, and nothing beyond that. It appeared that the only wise ones in the country are those with the good old Globe and Mail who said that the Senate passed the bill, which indicates that they have great confidence in the Senate. The radio news report went across the country, and despite the fact that the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition had a discussion here this morning, it is a whisper for all purposes and will not be heard.

A second thing that bothers me is that there is some dangerous talk about defying the law. I don't know whether these are responsible people, but someone is talking about it and it troubles me. It is important that the members of the Senate convey to the people of Canada the fact that the Senate had good reason for not approving the bill earlier this morning, and that the Senate is unanimous in supporting the bill.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I wish to insert a word or two here because of a remark made by Senator Buckwold. I think he mentioned that the report of the committee which he co-chaired favoured intervention by Parliament when the public interest is at stake. I hope he does not go beyond that to suggest that we should always intervene in an ad hoc way. There should be some mechanism to ensure that Parliament does not deal with problems of that kind in a certain manner on one day and in another manner on another day, and to prevent having five or six bills every session dealing with emergency situations.

The Labour Code or whatever legislation applies in this case should provide means to prevent that. I agree with Senator Roblin's point that there are difficulties in this particular area, but this is not the only area where Parliament has had to intervene.

I hope Senator Buckwold does not suggest that the report of which he speaks promotes the idea that Parliament should intervene on an ad hoc basis.

Finally, I should tell Senator Croll that I was on the news at 8 o'clock this morning. Perhaps he does not listen to the better type station that interviews guys like me, but I explained what happened in the Senate. I think my explanation was clear. I join him in telling the people of Canada that the Senate is unanimous in asking the workers to go back to work, and we are confident they will respect the will of Parliament even if they detest the government.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator McIlraith speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of the bill.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I listened attentively to the views expressed by the honourable senator opposite from Stadacona, the honourable senator from Saskatoon, the honourable senator from Red River, the honourable senator from Toronto-Spadina, rather briefly, and the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, the senator from Rougemont.

They all expressed themselves eloquently, but I was slightly troubled by some of their remarks in that they discussed subjects of the utmost importance—subjects which I would dearly like to debate—but which veered on being not quite relevant to the bill before us. The honourable senator from Stadacona discussed in a general way the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and he made some general remarks of considerable interest on it. Other members followed up on those remarks.

I do not propose to attempt to answer all the wide-ranging points raised by honourable senators. I would like, however, to draw the attention of the Senate to one or two paragraphs in the Speech from the Throne in connection with the work being done with a view to bringing forward amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, which are as follows:

The Government is committed to continued wage restraint in the public sector. You will be asked to approve amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act to ensure that compensation in the federal public service remains in step with the private sector, and does not lead the way.

You will also be asked to enact legislation making the Post Office a Crown Corporation, with a view to making postal services more efficient and responsive to public needs.

While both of these subjects are of major concern to the Senate, honourable senators will understand if I do not follow the attractive course of digressing into a debate on them today. That can take place during the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, or when the measures in question are before us. The bill before us now is quite specific and narrow, if I may use that term, in its application. It is concerned with the particular dispute that is going on now between the Post Office and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, and nothing else.

I was particularly pleased to hear the Leader of the Opposition say that he wanted this bill to go forward with the unanimous support of this house. However, I noted that the spokesmen for the official opposition in the Senate on this measure went a long way to indicate the opposition's disapproval of it. Quite frankly, that puzzled me. I thought all honourable senators, however much they might dislike having to legislate an end to such a strike, thought it necessary to do so in the circumstances in which we find ourselves. I can only assume that the spokesmen for the opposition on this bill, including the honourable senator from Red River (Senator Roblin), when the latter made the statement that the government "hesitated, fumbled and procrastinated," were suffering from euphoria or a light case of over-enthusiasm as a result of having heard on Monday evening what to them was good news, and not anything relevant to the bill. I hope that my assessment of the reason for their over-enthusiasm in attacking the government on this particular measure at this particular moment can be explained in that way. If so, I, for one, would be quite prepared to forgive them, but I did not feel their criticisms should pass unnoticed. Such criticism, indeed, is not justified in the circumstances.

I do not think there is anything else I can add at this time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I propose asking the Senate to commit the bill to a Committee of the Whole, and, in accordance with rule 18, invite the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and Acting Minister of Labour to take a seat in the Senate chamber to answer any questions with respect to this legislation.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook, that the bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole later this day.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, so as not to interrupt the continuity of the appearance of the Acting Minister of Labour before the Committee of the Whole, I would propose that the Senate now adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 2 o'clock p.m.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 2.15 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was adjourned during pleasure and put into Committee of the Whole on Bill C-8, intituled: "An Act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services," the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C., in the Chair.

Pursuant to rule 18 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable André Ouellet, P.C., Minister of State for Urban Affairs and Acting Minister of Labour, was escorted to a seat in the Senate Chamber.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, on behalf of all members of the Senate I should like to extend to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and Acting Minister of Labour a most hearty welcome to this house. I understand that the minister will make some opening remarks and then he will be ready to answer such questions as members of the Senate might like to ask.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators. I should like at the outset to indicate that the government tried to come to a negotiated settlement of this dispute. Indeed, during the course of the time allowed for the negotiations strenuous efforts were made to arrive at such a settlement, but it became apparent that the parties were very far apart and that the chances of a negotiated settlement were very, very slim. Normally negotiations of this kind that fall under the Public Service Staff Relations Board are dealt with under the auspices of another branch of the government, and the Department of Labour is not involved. In this case at the request of the parties the Department of Labour became involved in the discussions with representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress in order to explore all possible avenues that might lead to a settlement. These talks were held during the weekend and on Monday. As it turned out, these last-ditch efforts were not successful. I might say that I feel it is very regrettable that we have had to go to this extreme of asking Parliament to act to bring about an end to a labour-management dispute.

You have before you a bill which proposes a course of action which still allows for the possibility of mediation. We are using a technique which is called the mediator-arbitrator concept, and this concept is one that has been used successfully on numerous occasions in the United States. It has also been used with some success in Canada, more recently in relation to the dispute with the grain handlers in western Canada and also with the longshoremen in Montreal. It provides for the parties being assisted by a very skilled mediator who has the power to act as arbitrator if that should become necessary. By virtue of his role as mediator, the parties still have the opportunity to carry out the negotiation process.

We have said in this bill that the mediator-arbitrator, while he will obviously try to bring the parties to a negotiated agreement, if he is not successful in his ventures, will act as arbitrator and will come forward within 90 days with recommendations that will form a collective agreement and that will be binding on both parties. That is the main feature of the legislation now before you.

Naturally I shall do my best to answer any questions that you may wish to ask and I shall be happy to listen to suggestions made by the honourable members of this house.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Minister. I presume that members of the Senate would like to ask questions, and it may be that they would wish to leave the title and the short title of the bill for consideration later. So is it agreed that we should leave those clauses so that members of the house may ask general questions about the legislation?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Grosart: Might I ask the chairman if it is the intention following the general discussion to consider the bill clause by clause?

The Chairman: I presume that will be the procedure to be followed, unless there is some objection. The way we normally proceed with the study of a bill is to take it clause by clause after general questions have been asked.

Senator Grosart: The reason I ask is that this procedure would separate the general questions on the legislation from those relating specifically to individual clauses.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry? Are there some general questions to be asked on this clause?

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question to put to the minister, a comment to make. I will make it in French as we are both French-speaking and we might be able to understand one another better.

In the course of the debate on second reading I pointed out to my colleagues that what surprised me most in the attitude of the government, the Post Office, and the Department of Labour, was that a group, the postal workers, a group of employees in the public service, was given the right to strike legally and, as far as I know, in this case it did become legal after the necessary delays had run out, so the strike the postal workers are or could be engaging in is a legal one. So how can he explain that even before that legal right to strike could be used by the postal workers, because the strike—and everyone knows it—is a means of pressure which exists in our statutes recognized by Parliament, so how is it the government thinks it has to introduce special legislation so quickly to tell the postal workers: You are not going to strike; even if you have the right to do so, you are not going to? You are not going to have that strike. So why not wait until the postal workers can use a legally obtained right to strike without abusing it? If they abuse it, well, the government could step in and tell them, listen, you are going too far. Your action can cause a lot of damage to the Canadian economy. It is regrettable that you did not understand but you are forcing us to pass special legislation which could be that which is before us today.

Is it not true that by introducing special legislation before Parliament today this could be an element of provocation against postal workers. Considering that they have obtained the right to strike legally, this could be an element of provocation which might incite them to disobey the legislation—something which we would seriously deplore—or might not facilitate future negotiations which could take place between your legally designated mediator-arbitrator or spoil relations with your department and the Post Office.

● (1410)

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I will reply briefly to the two points raised by the honourable senator.

The first concerns the effect of introducing this bill too early and of not allowing the postal workers to use their right to strike for a certain time.

I must remind the honourable senator that postal strikes have disturbed postal operations many times in Canada these last few years; that this situation has brought about a significant decrease in the effectiveness of the Canadian postal service; and that, quite recently, another group of employees, the Letter Carriers' Union of Canada, used its right to strike for a few days. The mediation was finally successful and the letter carriers accepted and signed a new collective agreement. But they had used their right to strike for a number of days and this brought about a suspension of postal operations.

I should add that, in fact, postal operations have been disturbed for a few days already in certain areas of Canada, especially in Montreal and certain cities in the province of Quebec, where the postal workers have been using de facto their right to strike for four or five days.

Senator Asselin: They are entitled to do so.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: No one is saying that they are not entitled to use their right to strike. This is the law. The postal workers have the right to go on strike and they have done so. What we must determine is for how long someone who is entitled to go on strike can stay on strike. There is no law that states that a strike must necessarily last for a minimum number of days. The law says that the Post Office employees have a right to go on strike.

What is important for the government, and not only for the government but also for members of Parliament and senators, is to determine when the public interest should have priority over individual rights. In view of the postal situation, in view of the importance of the postal service for millions of Canadians, and in view also of the important economic effects that suspension of the postal service can have on the Canadian economy, the government therefore decided to introduce a bill which places the collective interest above individual rights.

This is why the bill has been introduced at this stage. There was no question of taking the right to strike away from postal workers. They exercised their right, but in the public interest we consider that they exercised it long enough.

As for the second question, whether this legislation might be considered as a provocation, I think we can give it several interpretations. The honourable senator may take it as a provocation. Personally, I believe that the best interpretation we can give of any Canadian Parliament legislation is that it is passed in the best interest of the community, which only demonstrates that members of Parliament are facing their responsibilities towards public opinion.

Senator Deschatelets: As concerns the request of Senator Asselin, I understand that the minister had the opportunity to discuss with union leaders a few days ago. So, is it true that at this time there is a conflict over several issues? For instance, there is the issue of wages and technological changes. There are also a considerable number of grievances. A figure of 50,000 has been mentioned. Furthermore, you realized that there was serious disagreement on those issues and that it was impossible to deal with them in a relatively short period. Is it true?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Yes, the honourable senator is perfectly right. There is no doubt that during our discussions with union representatives we did suggest two possibilities. The first was to appoint a mediator-arbitrator who might eventually render a final decision. It seems that the union raised some objections about this proposal. Then we suggested an immediate return to negotiations and the appointment of a mediation commissioner who might be required to help parties in the negotiation of a collective agreement.

But we pointed out to the union representatives that, to give a chance to the mediation commissioner or mediator-arbitrator, this should be done in the absence of any pressure or any threat from either side. We then said to the union that we would require the government to put aside its intention to have legislation passed in Parliament to force workers to go back to work, but that, on the other hand, we would expect the union leaders to urge their members to go back to work while this mediator would do his job. It became obvious that this condition which we wanted from the employer and this other condition which we wanted to impose on the employees could not be accepted by the union's representatives. In those circumstances, it seemed impossible to make progress and get a fruitful mediation in a short while. We were facing very long negotiations which would bring about a disruption of postal service for several weeks.

The Chairman: Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question, in view of what he has just said, since he seems to be saying that the government is holding its position that the right to strike in the Public Service should be retained on the condition that it be exercised in a certain way. Is the minister suggesting for instance that if a union, instead of exercising its right over a certain period of time, were to use it only in a sporadic way, that is, one day here and one day there, the government would not intervene? Is that, in his mind, the kind of right to strike the government has extended to members of the Public Service?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: That is not at all what I said. I think that the honourable senator should understand that the right to strike granted to public servants is used in many ways by various unions and that each case must be considered as it occurs.

We cannot have an overall and similar approach in every case. We must allow each member of Parliament, or each government member, to evaluate a given situation as it occurs. The right to strike does exist and as far as I know the legislation to that effect has not been amended. So we must consider each situation as it arises.

We have before us a very precise case, that is, postal workers who use their right to strike, and the government feels that it is important under the circumstances to introduce legislation which provides for resumption and continuation of postal services at this time. That is why we have this piece of legislation.

Senator Flynn: I understand the reason, but what I mean about the employee is that it is quite important that he understand the government's intention when it gives him the right to strike. You say he can exercise it even if he misuses it? Where do we draw the line? You say that the government will decide in some cases and the employee does not know what kind of decision the government is going to make. This is what I want to know. Do you consider that if this right were exercised reasonably you would not step in? It is a matter of government policy. Parliament must make a decision about the bill now before us, I agree. I think that by the unanimous vote on second reading we have agreed to tell the postal workers to go back to work. However, what I would like the minister to clarify is what line of action he recommends to those postal workers who have the right to strike. What standards in the application of this right would save Parliament from stepping in at the first occasion? Is harassing only tolerated? The government does not consider acceptable a full right to strike because each time such a right is exercised Parliament is asked to take action.

I would like to know if the government has any policy on that question. You simply say that you will judge each case as it comes. As far as the government-employer is concerned, it is only a matter of opportunism.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I think the honourable senator tries to take advantage of a particular case to draw a general policy.

Senator Flynn: There is none.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I must remind him that staff relations in the public sector have changed a lot over the years. Obviously, one cannot draw the same parallel between the right to strike in the private sector and in the public sector.

The honourable senator must know and understand that in a dispute in the private sector only one employer and a certain number of employees are involved. In many cases, it does not affect any third party. But the situation is very different when we talk of the right to strike in the public sector, in cases of a dispute between the government, as employer, and its employees; the people who are most affected, not the people involved but the people most affected, are the general public. It is this third party who suffers most and who is, in a manner of speaking, made a victim or a hostage of this situation.

Under such circumstances, the employer, who is both employer and government, has a very delicate and weighty double responsibility. At some point he must say that in the public interest, because as government he must be concerned with the public interest, he must submit to Parliament a course of action which satisfies not exactly private interests but general interests as well. In this instance, I would ask the honourable senator not to draw broad conclusions because, I repeat, each case must be judged on its merits and in light of surrounding circumstances. However, in this case, the government believed that public interest required passage of this legislation, at this time.

Senator Flynn: Mr. Chairman, could the minister tell us if, in his view, in the area of postal service, it would be possible to have a situation where strike action would not affect the public, yet that right to strike could be maintained for the employees? More directly, does the minister or the government seriously believe that in an area where the public will in any event suffer, the right to strike should be maintained, if only in principle, subject to an ad hoc decision?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I wonder if the honourable senator is not trying through his question to reflect his own party's policy on the issue.

Senator Flynn: No, not at all.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: In any case, it is clear to me that in the issues at hand, that is, Post Office employees where there are many unions—not only the Postal Workers Union but numerous others—that those unions enjoy the right to strike and some of them have exercised it on occasion, that there have been settlements, often before the right to strike was exercised, and often after it has been exercised for some days. It is therefore possible to say, to answer the honourable senator's question, that postal workers or other postal employees belonging to other unions may on occasion exercise the right to strike. This has occurred in the past and may occur again in the future without endangering the public interest, the public good. Therefore in this case it seems to us, and this is a matter of opinion—the honourable senator may feel the strike should go on. That is for him to say.

Senator Flynn: I have suggested the opposite.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: However, it is the government's position that the time has come to legislate these employees back to work.

Senator Langlois: Mr. Chairman, although my question concerns mainly clause 5, I would like to put it at this stage of general questions, believing as I do that the answers I will be receiving from the honourable minister will allow us to place the problem into a more realistic context, because up to now in this debate many honourable senators have been wondering what efforts, what attempts have been made to date to try and prevent getting into this impasse. Because with clause 5 we are reviving a collective agreement that ceased to exist in July 1977, we are maintaining that agreement for a period of two years and a half. I would like to know, the better to assess what we are asked to do today, the remedy we are asked to enact, what attempts, what efforts were made, by both government as employer and the employees, to try to prevent getting into this impasse and the need for the legislation now before us?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I have here some notes in English. I might read them.

● (1430)

[English]

First of all I should like to say that, as the honourable senator has just mentioned, the previous collective agreement between the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and the Treasury Board expired on June 30, 1977. In the early months of 1977 several pre-negotiation meetings took place between the parties, but without any progress being made. On May 4, 1977, the union served formal notice to bargain, with Treasury Board replying immediately, on May 6, 1977. The first formal meeting, which took place on May 19, 1977, lasted one hour and was the only one for several months.

On November 30, 1977, the employer filed an application with the Public Service Staff Relations Board for the appointment of a conciliation board. The conciliation board was created, and Mr. Louis Courtemanche was appointed chairman on February 2, 1978. Previously, at the end of December, Mr. Roy Heenan, on behalf of management, and Mr. Irving Gaul, on behalf of the union, had been named to the conciliation board.

There were many public conciliation hearings from April through July, 1978. Closed conciliation sessions involving both parties began on July 18, 1978, and continued through to the end of the month. During these extensive conciliation board proceedings the parties were able to agree to only a few minor clauses.

On August 16, 1978, the union gave notice that it wanted the conciliation process to be terminated, and asked the board to prepare its report. The conciliation board handed down three separate reports, which were released to the parties on October 6, 1978. The lack of agreement by the three members of the conciliation board is an indication of the intense feelings of the parties, and of the wide differences between them on a large number of very complex contract items.

Notwithstanding the very exhaustive efforts of the conciliation board from April to August, 1978, little was achieved in the way of bringing the parties closer to agreement, and since the handing down of the three separate board reports it has become apparent that a very wide gap between the parties still exists.

As honourable senators know, there have been interventions at the official level by the Department of Labour, and, in fact, meetings took place between officials of the Department of Labour, myself and representatives of the union. Present at those meetings, with the object of further encouraging a negotiated settlement by the inclusion of other third parties, was a representative of the Canadian Labour Congress in the person of its vice-president. She participated in some of our discussions at that time. Unfortunately, we could not arrive at any positive, conclusive decisions.

This was the timetable of the events leading to this impasse. Obviously, the government did not want to legislate the employees back to work, and the government still does not favour this route as being the best one. We still believe that a negotiated settlement is the best way to deal with labour-management disputes, and we are convinced that by suggesting to Parliament in this piece of legislation that it appoint a mediator-arbitrator, we are still keeping open the possibility of arriving at a negotiated settlement between the parties in the near future.

Senator Greene: In light of the alarming statements already issued by some of the locals that whether this bill becomes law or not they do not intend to obey it; and in light of the fact that under our constitutional practice the prosecution of offences, including offences even under the Criminal Code or other quasi-criminal statutes, are normally under the authority of the provincial attorney general, if there be an offence under this act, will it be the intention of the government to ask the attorney general in the province where the offence occurs to prosecute or to determine whether he should prosecute, or is some other course envisaged?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I very much appreciate the question of the honourable senator, but I should like to approach the situation thinking positively; that is, that the union, the union leaders, and the employees of the Post Office will respect an act of Parliament and will obey accordingly.

[Translation]

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister would give us an idea of the salaries paid to the postal workers and tell us what these people are asking for, what we should give them and at the same time could he give us an idea of the salaries paid to employees in the public sector who do similar work? I have never heard these points being mentioned and it seems that it would be very interesting if he could give us such an idea in order to know what we are supposed to do.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I think the honourable senator will find the pay scale in the documents regulating the Post Office employees. It would be rather difficult for me at this time to give you a detailed list of the wages of all the employees. I see that Senator Asselin is handing you a copy which probably will give you some idea of that kind of pay scale. However I would want to point out to honourable senators that salaries in this case do not seem to be one of the main issues. Of course, salary issues always represent an important element in collective agreement bargaining but as you know, under an act of Parliament, namely the Anti-Inflation Act, this collective agreement so far as the first part is concerned—that is, up to December 31, 1978—is regulated by and comes under the Anti-Inflation Act.

Therefore, everybody and both parties know full well that there are statutory limits imposed on salaries.

The points of controversy have to do with the introduction of mechanization and automation in postal operations. Also at issue are job classifications and some decisions related to the administration of postal operations. All these questions cannot be dealt with under the Public Service Staff Relations Act. The body which manages industrial relations in the Public Service is governed by very specific laws under which some of the demands of the postal workers of Canada are not negotiable. When the postal services are turned into a crown corporation they will no longer be governed by the Public Service Staff Relations Act but by the Canada Labour Code, and some of the claims of the workers will then become negotiable items. But at the moment that is not the case.

Senator Beaubien: But what is a postal worker earning? That is all I am asking you, what does he want to earn per year?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I think that the postal workers of Canada, that is, the Union of Postal Workers of Canada, come under a dozen classifications and obviously I cannot tell you what the average salary of these employees is but it seems to vary between $13,000 and $16,000.

Senator Beaubien: And what do they want? How much do they want to earn? And would the minister tell us what in his opinion is the salary of employees working in the public sector in similar occupations?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I had asked someone to check the salary scale. I am sorry but I am not the Postmaster General and I am not familiar with these details but I will give you an answer in a moment.

Senator Langlois: Mr. Chairman, on the same subject, would not the honourable senator who asked the question be satisfied if we were given the percentage of the raise which has been asked? It might be easier to get an answer.

Senator Beaubien: Has the minister no idea of what these people earn?

The Chairman: I understand that the minister and the official who is helping him now are going to look into the matter and give a satisfactory answer, I hope.

[English]

Senator Grosart: I should like to follow up on Senator Greene's question. I sympathize, of course, with the position taken by the minister. He hopes, as we all do, that the postal workers will obey the law if and when this bill becomes law. On the other hand, there have been reports in the press that the workers may be advised or directed to disobey the law.

We are aware of the minister's statement that it is the intention of the government to give effect to the recommendations of the joint committee which studied the matter of public service staff relations, and I quote his words:

The government, therefore, proposes that the intent of the joint committee's proposals on prosecution for unlawful activity be incorporated into this act.

I presume he is referring to an amendment to the Public Service Staff Relations Act. Hansard is not clear as to what act he is referring. We are aware that these recommendations have not been incorporated into any act of Parliament at the moment. I would ask him, therefore, if the government has anticipated the possibility of unlawful disobedience of the law of the land in this matter, and if it has plans or a program to deal with that situation should it occur.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: The amendment to which the honourable senator refers has to deal with recommendations that were made some time ago by a joint committee of this Parliament, which committee indeed pointed out some of the deficiencies of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and recommended some amendments in relation to the fines that could be imposed. Therefore, when we decided to introduce this piece of legislation we took into account the recommendation made by the joint committee and increased the fines accordingly. I must add that this bill does not amend the whole Public Service Staff Relations Act. It amends the act only in relation to the employees who fall under this collective agreement, and nobody else but these people.

I want to treat the subject of disobedience as a political question. I reiterate that I hope it will be only a political question, that it will not become a reality. I have confidence that after the passage of this bill the employees will realize that it is in the best interests of the land to have postal services in active operation in Canada, and that it is in the best interests of the employees themselves to obey the law and take full advantage of this mediator-arbitrator, who could bring about a good negotiated settlement.

Senator Grosart: In view of the minister's answer, could he tell us if in his opinion the changes that are made by clause 10 to the existing situation indicate as far as the government intends to go in the matter of prosecution for unlawful activities? As I understand it, clause 10 refers only to the penalties, not to the type and kind of prosecution that might be found effective in the event of unlawful disobedience.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Let me say two things. Clause 10 includes penalties which follow directly those recommended by the joint committee. The joint committee also envisaged a single stage process whereby prosecutions would be before the Public Service Staff Relations Board. Since it will not be physically possible to set up exactly this process in the short time available, the government is now proposing that a single stage process be provided by eliminating for offences under this bill the necessity for consent to prosecute. That is another aspect of the recommendations of the joint committee that has been taken into consideration.

Senator Grosart: Will other recommendations of the joint committee in this area also be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Indeed, the government has indicated on previous occasions that it will be bringing forward comprehensive amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, which will include responses to the numerous recommendations of the joint committee concerning prosecutions and penalties for unlawful activities. This should come in the near future.

Senator Grosart: In view of the fact that there seems to be a general feeling around the country that there must be a better way than the one before us to settle industrial disputes in the public sector, and that the "schedule of events," to use the minister's phrase, leading up to the present impasse goes far beyond the last year or so—in fact, one can trace it back clearly to at least ten years ago—among the amendments that are under consideration by the government, would one include an implementation of the recommendation of the Woods Commission that there be set up a Public Interest Disputes Commission to deal with this situation? There are many who feel that the present situation may well have been caused by the failure of the government to act on many of the very sensible recommendations of the Woods Commission ten years ago.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I don't think we could draw from the circumstances in one case the conclusion that the government has failed. There have been hundreds of negotiated settlements within the Public Service, more particularly under the Public Service Staff Relations Act. There have been hundreds of cases where in fact good, constructive collective agreements have been signed. I did not hear the honourable senator saying that the government has not been successful.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps the minister would allow me to clarify that. I am quite sure I said that the government had failed to implement some of the recommendations of the Woods Commission. I will reserve my opinion on whether I believe that overall the government has failed in the matter of settling disputes in the Public Service.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I can assure the honourable senator that the recommendations of the Woods Commission are under active consideration.

Senator Macdonald: I should like to ask two questions. First, would the bill prevent a legal strike being called in a limited sense; say, for instance, a rotating strike or a strike in the Toronto sorting office? Secondly, I understand that one of the issues in dispute is that automation or technological changes cannot be negotiated under the present law, but they could be negotiated under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and that is one of the reasons why they want this crown corporation. Is it illegal to negotiate such technological changes or suggest that they won't do it because they don't have to do it? Thirdly, if it is illegal, would the arbitrator have the right to negotiate such changes?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Some aspects of technological change have been brought before the Public Service Staff Relations Board. Indeed, some of these very points have been referred by Mr. Brown, the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, to the conciliation board chaired by Mr. Courtemanche. Mr. Courtemanche has dealt at length with some aspects of article 29, which is the article of the collective agreement which deals specifically with technological change.

As I indicated earlier, the conciliation board's report was not unanimous; quite the contrary. There were three members of the board who produced their own report. Because this aspect has been referred to the conciliation board by the Public Service Staff Relations Act, it will therefore be the prerogative of the mediator-arbitrator to look at these questions, and he could indeed come forward with some recommendations that would be binding upon the two parties.

Senator Macdonald: Would you care to express an opinion as to whether this act prevents the calling of a strike in one post office?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: The Public Service Staff Relations Act deals specifically with slowdowns, partial strikes and rotating strikes. This is dealt with outside the collective agreement itself and, therefore, to do such a thing is unlawful according to the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Mr. Chairman, may I ask a supplementary question?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps I should take a minute to explain my difficulty. Clause 5 extends the term of the collective agreement to December 31, 1979, as it exists but I assume also as modified in the future by the mediator-arbitrator. In the first subsection of clause 6, a mediator-arbitrator is appointed "who shall (a) forthwith endeavour to mediate"—I think everybody understands that quite well—and "(b) where he is unable to bring about agreement . . . render an arbitral award in respect thereof."

The minister has said that the award will be binding on all the parties involved. There is no definition of the words "arbitral award" in the bill. It may be that the binding effect arises out of provisions in the Public Service Staff Relations Act which are referred to in subclause (2), but I see nothing specific in the bill about the binding character of the work that the mediator-arbitrator might do under subclause (1) of clause 6.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question by the honourable senator, I would like to refer him to one of the very first definitions existing in the Public Service Staff Relations Act, the definition of "arbitral award." It is strictly an award that has been given by an arbitrator appointed under section 62 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and that indeed qualifies the role and the responsibilities of an arbitrator.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): It does not say whether it is binding or not.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Oh yes, it does say it is binding in relation to when an arbitrator is appointed with that mandate to bring about a collective agreement.

Senator van Roggen: Mr. Minister, although I will vote for this bill in the circumstances, I find great difficulty in supporting the concept, on the one hand, that public servants, particularly in essential services, have the right to strike and then, on the other hand, going through the charade, after only one day's strike, of taking it away from them. It seems to me that labour is ill-served by this whole procedure.

Another point I would make is that it is unfortunate that we so often refer to public services rather than essential services. Surely it is essential services that are vital to the nation. Such services are provided by both the private sector and the public sector. I would submit, Mr. Minister, it is high time that we face the fact, at least at the level of federal government, that the right to strike in essential services—and I stress that word “essential” as opposed to “public”—is basically a charade, because as soon as the country is tied up we have to call Parliament together to do something that should not be Parliament’s function. I wish to put this on the record. I do not want your detailed answer. I will have another question for you in a moment. But I think it is high time that Parliament had something to say about this rather ridiculous charade we are asked to go through every once in a while.

I would suggest that in areas of essential services, whether in the private or public sector, legislation should provide for an independent tribunal that would establish what level of service is necessary to be maintained in order to provide an essential service. A simple example would be four ferries running every day from A to B, and the ferry workers go on strike. Perhaps two of those ferries could provide the essential service. If the postal workers are to have the right to strike, an independent tribunal might decree that an essential service can be maintained by requiring that first-class mail, and not junk mail, be moved.

In any event, I simply wish to go on record as objecting to the foolishness I am asked to participate in of supporting the principle of the right to strike in the public service, which principle does not serve labour because, of course, they have no such right. The nation cannot stand it, so we are called together to pass legislation such as this within one day of the strike taking place. These are observations that I hope you will carry back to your confrères.

Section 10 of this bill prescribes quite substantial fines for disobeying its provisions, but nothing is said about terminating the employment of those who disobey and go on strike. I would like to know whether there is sufficient provision in the Public Service Staff Relations Act to enable you to terminate the employment of those people who disobey, as opposed to only fining them.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I can answer that question very briefly. In the Public Service Staff Relations Act—not in the bill that honourable senators have to deal with today, but under the general legislation that governs employees of the government—there are provisions to that effect.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, the bell in the other place is ringing for a division. This raises an embarrassing question that I want to draw to the attention of the house, and that is whether we wish to let the minister leave for a few minutes in order to vote, or whether we wish to continue.

The Chairman: We should ask the minister what he would like to do. It is not for us to decide.

Senator Flynn: The government is safe.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I know that honourable senators would want to do their duty, so as a member of the other place, and since there is a vote, I think it is one of my prime responsibilities as an elected representative to vote.

Senator Grosart: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I do not wish to inconvenience the Senate, though.

Senator Flynn: If you want to vote, go and vote.

The Chairman: We can adjourn now and ask leave to sit later. It depends on how long you will need.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: It is a recorded vote on the Speech from the Throne, and should be finished in 15 minutes.

Senator Grosart: I should like to assure the minister that he will be welcome back regardless of which way he votes.

Senator Langlois: In the meantime, could we proceed with the debate on the Speech from the Throne?

Senator McIlraith: I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The Chairman: It is moved by Senator McIlraith, seconded by Senator Cook, that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: The sitting is resumed.

Senator Bourget: Madam Speaker, the committee to which was referred Bill C-8, to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services, has taken the said bill into consideration, had made some progress thereon, and asks leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Senator McIlraith: Later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook, that the committee have leave to sit again later this day. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Perrault: As was suggested by the deputy leader a few moments ago, and if it is convenient to the Senate, I am prepared to contribute to the Throne Speech debate now because I must be absent from the chamber tomorrow. When the minister returns, we can hear him or make other arrangements.

Senator Flynn: How long will you be?

Senator Perrault: It will not take too long to refute the points advanced by the opposition.

Senator Flynn: Very often you are entirely irrelevant.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Rizzuto, seconded by Senator Bird, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: First of all, I should like to join other honourable senators in expressing my gratitude to His Excellency, the Governor General of Canada, for his splendid and outstanding contribution during his years of service. He has been a great asset to all of us and, together with his wife, has served us with great distinction. In the Throne Speech the Governor General indicated that he may retire in the near future, and I must say that we regret this decision.

Honourable senators, I would like to add to the tributes already paid to Madam Speaker. She continues to perform her duties with efficiency and grace. She is an outstanding speaker and representative of the Senate. In addition to her work on behalf of all of us here, her ambassadorial efforts—or however one describes those duties these days—to innumerable groups, and her warmth, knowledge and vivacity, have made the Senate many friends. For this she has our double appreciation.

Next, I congratulate the Honourable Senator Rizzuto, the mover of the motion for an Address in reply, and the seconder of the motion, Senator Bird. Both made speeches rich in reason and compassion. As newer senators, they underlined the fact that their appointments and others in recent months have been appointments of great merit.

As well, all of us welcome the presence here of more opposition representation because excellent appointments to the ranks of the opposition have been made recently, which brings me to our friend and colleague, the Leader of the Opposition. He is not a new boy. Indeed, it has been said that his speech was not unpredictable. In terms of service here, he is a hardy perennial, indeed, a Tory from Quebec has to be an extremely resilient and hardy person.

Senator Flynn: The same will be said of Liberals from British Columbia soon.

Senator Perrault: Together with his other admirers, I can appreciate the difficulties he must have encountered when he set about to analyze the Speech from the Throne. After all, the Leader of the Opposition is, by his very nature, normally optimistic, good natured and a sunny person. In this case, he has been seemingly forced against his own instincts to paint a very sombre and cheerless picture of this nation. He is forced into this unaccustomed stance every fall, and we understand that is because of the political imperatives which exist in Canada today, although it is uncharacteristic of his nature. However, he undertook his task in great, flamboyant style. It is because of my appreciation for the burden that he carries that in my modest way I hope to uplift him today, to bring a few rays of sunshine into that cloud of depression in which he cloaks himself every fall.

We have many problems in Canada, honourable senators, but in the context of a world rocked by economic shocks since 1972 we have an immense amount for which to be grateful. The Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development the other day evaluated the nations of the world on the question of so-called "quality of life." Sweden was number one and Canada was number two. I think Canadians would put us solidly number one.

Consider these quick facts, honourable senators. Since 1968, Canada's gross national product has grown from $72.6 billion to $230.1 billion. In the same period our work force has grown by 2.5 million. We have the fastest growing work force in the entire world today. In the 12-month period from July 1977 to July 1978, 376,000 new jobs were created in this country. No other country can match that performance.

Let's review the past 10 years in terms of disposable income. Disposable income has increased from $46.8 billion in 1968 to $139.3 billion in 1977. After allowing for inflation, the average Canadians' income increased by 4 per cent in 1976 and 3 per cent in 1977. That is real progress which should hearten all of us, including our friends in the opposition.

With these figures in mind, honourable senators, I suggest to you that our balance of payments problems may be one of the legacies of prosperity—a price to be paid. Before this government came into power 10 years ago—a happy circumstance, I suggest—only a relatively few Canadian families could afford a winter vacation in the south. Today, in many parts of the country, it is an annual ritual.

I would ask Senator Roblin, who is not in the chamber at this moment, to consider the number of Manitobans who each winter decide to escape the invigorating, stimulating and bracing climate of downtown Winnipeg or Thompson by going south. The same applies to British Columbians, even though they have a milder climate. Package tours to Hawaii have increased one hundredfold in recent years, and this is the case across the country. People in the east go to Florida or the Caribbean. This is a fact of weather, but even more so an indication of the increased prosperity of the Canadian people.

Most certainly we have balance of payments problems, but this is despite a substantial trading surplus. We have to face the fact that Canadians are continuing to travel abroad in large numbers, and that we must pay interest on the foreign investments which have done so much to boost our growth since World War II. In the face of these facts, all of us should welcome the many initiatives taken by governments, federal and provincial, to boost tourism in Canada. For the first time, we have a co-ordinated program between industry and all levels of government. The introduction of lower domestic air fares is a very welcome move, and we should welcome as well the spirited marketing program of VIA Rail. All of these initiatives help. A number of provinces, backed by excellent promotional campaigns, have just completed bumper tourism seasons.

When one looks at the statistics prepared by the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development for the past few years, the balance of payments situation is the only category in which Canada does not place in the top three of all of the major industrialized nations—the very top three. No one can be satisfied with the level of unemployment in Canada. But to suggest, as some opposition critics do, that this government has done little to spur job creation is to ignore the facts. The OECD puts Canada on the very top of the table in terms of creating jobs. In the years from 1970 to 1977, employment in Canada grew by 23 per cent. Quite a way behind us came the United States, with 15 per cent. This same organization examined the rate of increase in real disposable income between 1972 and 1976. Who was top in this category? Canada was on top, followed by Japan and Italy. The same organization looked at the cost of living. Canada was not number one in this category. We had slipped to a close second place behind the United States of America.

This country was not at the top in the OECD poll of nations with the fastest growth of industrial production. In this category it was Norway, fueled by its North Sea oil discoveries. Where was Canada? Well, we had slipped to second in that category. The Canadian cost-of-living index is only marginally higher than that of the United States, the leader in that category in the world. Living in many European countries and Japan costs more than half as much again as living in this country.

The official opposition should be reminded that Canada is performing notably in practically every international category. For this reason, we should not take a narrow inward looking and pessimistic approach. We are a trading nation. We have to take on the world. We have to compete in a world which has suffered serious economic shocks. I suggest that our overall performance stacks up ahead of any other country in this category in the past decade.

This economic performance has been conducted in tandem with a program of social measures which are envied around the world. The Right Honourable the Prime Minister described the government's social policies as "intelligent compassion." It would be difficult for any fair-minded person to quibble with that description. We hear all sorts of reports about economic problems in Canada. Yet, as a member of the government, I see, week after week, the many applications which come in from all over the world from people wanting to invest their money in this country in a very major way. At times, one cannot resist the feeling that there are many people in other parts of the world with more confidence in our country than have some native-born Canadians.

Getting back to social policies for a moment, certainly the Senate of the United States has been hearing about the social benefits of health care in Canada. Senator Kennedy brought witnesses from Canada to tell a Congressional committee of our compassionate system. Some of us met him a few months ago when he came to Canada, at which time he said that the Canadian program of medical and hospital care is the best he had encountered anywhere in the world. We have managed to combine a strong economic performance with a compassionate social system without draining the financial resources of the individual.

Some critics—I hear them and you hear them—trumpet how the average American allegedly takes home more than his Canadian counterpart. They say we are overtaxed and are being driven into the earth, and incentive is being destroyed. Well, perhaps there are current arguments to be made for tax cuts in certain areas, but let's look at the tax situation, again letting independent research be the judge.

The Financial Post of September 30, 1978, contained the report of a study conducted by a British business research organization called Employment Conditions Abroad Ltd. This organization compared tax and social security deductions in nine countries. At the $15,000-a-year level, Canadians pay 32 per cent in tax and social security deductions. Only the French, the British and the Japanese pay less. At the $23,000-a-year level, it is the same order, with the Canadians now contributing 37 per cent. At the $31,000-a-year level, Canada is in second place behind France, with 39 per cent. Similarly, at the $41,000-a-year level, and at every one of those levels, the U.S. salary earner loses more in taxes and social security deductions than does his Canadian counterpart.

Senator Walker: Do those figures include provincial taxes, or do they represent merely the net federal taxes payable?

Senator Perrault: It is my understanding that this is an assessment of the total impact of taxes of all kinds at those income levels. If this is not the case, I would be very pleased to bring supplementary information to the attention of the house.

Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne is not an elaborate document. It does, however, underline and reiterate the immensely important pledges made by the government over the past three years. It was in 1975 that the national government pledged to bring its own spending, as a percentage of the gross national product, down, and to restrict the rate of growth in the Public Service. That pledge has been met.

When in Bonn, the Prime Minister made another commitment, this time to the leaders of the other major economic powers of the world. He promised that the Canadian government would do its part in helping to get the sluggish international economy moving. Again, the promise was kept. On August 1, the Prime Minister returned and told the nation that there would be, to quote him, "a major re-ordering of government priorities." The twin challenges of inflation and unemployment would be resolutely faced, he said. As a result, government spending would be slashed by $2.5 billion. The civil service would lose something like 5,000 jobs. Departments have pared their estimates. Some of the moves have not been useful or popular politically, but they are meeting the vital commitments made at Bonn, and they are in the national interest.

No one thought for a moment that departmental budgetary cuts felt deeply at local levels would cause anything but political problems for many of the Liberal candidates in the recent by-elections. The government did not undertake this program of cuts with the false hope that they would contribute a magic solution to Canada's problems, and an instant path to political popularity and success. They were measures taken because the public interest had to be put before the short-term political gain.

Knowing the deep cuts made by my ministerial colleagues in their departments, I have been amazed at how certain political critics have described the cuts as "imaginary." Now that Parliament has resumed, opposition spokesmen are angrily demanding to know why certain programs have been cancelled. The so-called "imaginary cutbacks" appear to have a very substantial reality to both opposition and government parliamentarians. Certainly some very forthright and indignant reaction has been forthcoming. In fact, honourable senators, the recent government programs and the Speech from the Throne reflect a determined and very real and tangible anti-inflationary program which was begun in 1975. The thrust has been there for over three years, and this lean, tough realistic policy is bringing its rewards. The government has said, "Less government." The government has said to private industry, "We are going to give you your head; you have been saying you want an opportunity to enterprise and to really move ahead and work. Here's your chance. There will be less government interference." These policies of less federal government involvement are already having a positive effect on the private sector.

Canada is now utilizing 86.4 per cent of its productive capacity compared with 80 per cent 18 months ago. Much has been done to encourage the small businessman; more money has been put into research and development. We have changed our energy policy and we have told the oil companies, "You will get more if you get out there and explore and develop. We are trusting you to invest more in exploration." And the oil companies are playing their part. Their exploration budgets have soared. The results: a major oil find in West Pembina, perhaps three billion barrels of oil; major natural gas finds in Alberta and northern British Columbia; the promise of Dome's work in the Beaufort Sea; the opening of the tar sands plant at Fort McMurray; the accelerated pace towards heavy oil development in Saskatchewan; and the discovery of perhaps the world's richest uranium deposit in the province of Saskatchewan. If energy is the key to the economic performance of the industrialized world in the next 15 years, 1978 will be looked upon as a banner year for Canada.

Confidence, we say to the opposition parties and the opposition groups in Parliament and in the country, confidence is what is needed in Canada. The complainers and the Doomsday Jeremiahs said that the United States Congress would never pass the Northern Pipeline Agreement. But it did, and it did so overwhelmingly. As a result, the economic benefits for Canada will be considerable into the early 1980s, with many, many jobs and with the effect of hundreds of millions of dollars in the money stream. "Confidence returning" was the headline in the Financial Times of October 9. The Financial Times looked at some of the projects going on with MacMillan Bloedel announcing a huge multi-million dollar expansion in British Columbia, and Uniroyal spending $23 million on radial tire production in Kitchener. Those hard-nosed financial managers and marketing managers have confidence, confidence that we are on the right road in this country.

Don't take the word of a partisan person for this. Here is the most recent survey of business attitudes conducted by the Conference Board of Canada:

The outlook for business investment is improving as senior corporate executives grow more confident about their economic prospects.

Here are some of the reasons behind this business confidence: manufacturers' unfilled orders are running 12 per cent ahead of last year and new orders are 15 per cent ahead; steel production is up 11 per cent; and electricity generation is up 9 per cent over 1977. The economy is beginning to hum.

And this confidence is being restored in the face of the sovereignty-association or separation talk in one of the provinces. Confidence, despite the threat of one-third of the Canadian market going it alone and a divided nation. Just imagine, if possible separation—as remote as it may appear—were not a factor in the equation now, the kind of boom which would exist in Canada. Undoubtedly, the prospect of separation, as unlikely as it may seem, has had an adverse effect on the Canadian dollar, but here again the government's determined and purposeful defence of federalism and its commitment towards seeing that all provinces, including the province of Quebec, assume their rightful place in Confederation has turned back the separatist momentum. I believe that time will show the government's record on this matter to be both courageous and correct.

The government's policy expressed in the Speech from the Throne means that there will be an even greater increase in business confidence in Canada. Certain social programs have undergone a process of reappraisal and alteration, and changes have been made to assist those in greatest need. There are major changes in the unemployment insurance program. The substantial savings amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars are going to be used for year-round employment programs including a program for young people. A new youth corps program is being brought into existence.

And while I am being briefly and uncharacteristically partisan, let me say to my friends opposite that the Conservative Party has said a lot about government give-aways in the past few years, but the most dangerous and destructive give-away program of them all appears to be proposed by the Conservative Party itself—the give-away of many federal powers to the provinces. Many Canadians of all parties believe that giving over the powers of the central government could do more long-term damage to Canada than many of the dangers which they allege to exist in Bill C-60. A fair and reasonable distribution of powers as recommended in the Speech from the Throne is one thing, but a wholesale hand-over and random dispersal is another. Senators will have read with interest the section respecting constitutional reform in the Speech from the Throne. One paragraph reads:

With respect to the reform of the Constitution, the Government has set out only two fundamental requirements. The new Constitution must provide for Canada to continue as a genuine federation, and it must contain a Charter of Rights and Freedoms, including linguistic rights. The Government has shown its deep concern that real progress towards change soon be achieved, so that uncertainty can be dispelled and unity reinforced. In particular, the Government believes it essential that clear and important progress be made before Quebecers are asked by their provincial government to vote in a referendum about their future.

Honourable senators will recall that when Bill C-60 was introduced, the assurance was given here on behalf of the Prime Minister that nothing was cast in concrete, and that all improvements, opinions and reactions would be considered. The summer's deliberations have shown that the government has an open mind and is receptive to new ideas. By setting a timetable for constitutional reform, the government has stimulated an excellent discussion and many good ideas have emerged—ideas which I am confident will lead to constructive changes in the proposed bill when it finally emerges.

It should be noted that the Speech from the Throne states emphatically that there is no intention to change or to reduce in any way the role Her Majesty plays. Many senators will have read the article written for the London Times by Mr. Charles Douglas-Home and published on August 29 last. In discussing the Governor General's role, Mr. Douglas-Home wrote:

Apart from these details however the office of the Governor General has not changed in any way which would warrant accusations that Mr. Trudeau was up to no good. Certainly Mr. Trudeau has been scrupulous in keeping the Queen informed of the trend of his thinking, and the Queen has for some time been of the view that some tidying up was necessary to establish clearly cut Canadian style constitutional monarchy, as opposed to a residual imperial offshoot of London.

Senator Grosart: She never said that, of course.

Senator Perrault: That is the end of the quotation. Having read that, let me return to the Speech from the Throne.

Senator Grosart: She never said that.

Senator Perrault: That is a quotation from an article in the London Times of August 29 last written by Mr. Douglas-Home. I would be pleased to provide a copy of the article to any interested senator.

Senator Grosart: That is what he said she said, but she never said that.

Senator Perrault: Having read this, let me return to the Speech from the Throne.

The government's view was and remains that the new Constitution should describe the situation as it exists in Canada today, and the government is pleased that the provincial premiers expressed the same view during their meeting in Regina.

Further to the subject of the Constitution, I want to comment on some of the statements made by the Leader of the Opposition last night. He claimed that the white paper, A Time for Action, by stating that the Senate is in need of reform, is, in effect, accusing the Senate of not having discharged its duties. I find that to be an odd and somewhat illogical interpretation by the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: Well, it says so.

Senator Perrault: Just because a government or an organization seeks to improve the status quo, surely that does not automatically indicate a dereliction of duty, and it does not support any accusation of dereliction of duty.

Times change. The Senate came into existence over 100 years ago. Obviously, Canada has seen many profound changes in that time. Many Canadian provinces were not even formed at the time of Confederation, as we know. Surely, to make the federal system work effectively, there is something to be said for improved regional representation, however that may be achieved. Every healthy organization undergoes change. Constructive change is progression and not dereliction of duty.

Never mind what Senator Flynn and others think of the proposals put forward in Bill C-60. While they certainly do not represent perfection in anyone's mind—including the governments—they have prompted the spirit of debate hoped for by this government.

Many senators believe that the Senate is an institution which can be improved. Interestingly enough, in most of the hearings held here in the summer, the consensus was that we do need a second chamber. Many suggestions have come in, many from senators themselves, on how that second chamber can be improved. There has been very little support for the idea of abolition. Many senators have their own ideas. By putting forward these ideas these senators do not accuse themselves and their colleagues of dereliction of duty. Patently not.

To Senator Flynn I say what the government has done in Bill C-60 is to say to Parliament and to the people, "Look, we have had enough talk about constitutional reform. We have been talking about it for over 100 years. All we have had so far is talk. Well, here are some proposals. Analyze them. Dissect them. If you do not like them, come up with something better." I think the last few weeks have been some of the most stimulating in the history of the country. The ideas which have been set forth by many outspoken people here, many in this chamber at the present time, have been a useful contribution to the dialogue.

I do not know if the Leader of the Opposition recalls a speech made to the Commons in June 1960 by the Right

Honourable John Diefenbaker, then Prime Minister of Canada. At that time, Mr. Diefenbaker said:

I realize that it is always a matter of interest that we in Canada, an independent country within the Commonwealth, have not yet secured the right to amend our own Constitution. Endeavours have been made throughout the years: the subject has been discussed over and over again. To me it is a political paradox and inconsistent with Canada's status.

That was Mr. Diefenbaker, the Conservative leader, in 1960. And he said again, and I am sure Honourable Senator Flynn sat there and applauded him as he spoke:

Indeed in so far as the other countries of the Commonwealth are concerned—the British Commonwealth or the old Commonwealth, whichever term you choose to use—Canada is the only country which has no provision made for the amendment of its own Constitution.

That is what Mr. Diefenbaker said to riotous applause, including the applause of Senator Flynn and others. That was 1960. I note that he is applauding. He still maintains his youthful enthusiasm. Isn't that marvellous?

Here we are 18 years later and we have at last a proposal, the proposal Mr. Diefenbaker talked about so much; the proposal talked about for years by political figures in all parties.

I told honourable senators a few weeks ago that nothing was cast in bronze, that there would be debate and examination and that the government would be open-minded towards suggestions. I suggest it has been, and will continue to be so.

On another point, throughout all Senator Flynn's comments on this subject, would I be fair in saying that he implied that the members on this side of the house were guilty of some kind of rubber stamping? Even last night he talked in terms of the majority, the loyal majority, which would sit here and pass government bills, seemingly obediently and without dissent. Is it so strange the people who want to sit here as Liberals usually find favour with Liberal policies? We have Liberal Party policy conventions.

Senator Grosart: It is getting stranger all the time.

Senator Perrault: We have caucus meetings at which senators put their opinions across very forcefully. The senators here have helped formulate many of the Liberal policies. This does not mean that senators on this side blindly accept every piece of legislation.

I do not need to tell Senator Flynn that we have a very effective committee system. We do pre-studies on important and complicated subjects. I do not think that Senator Hayden, for example, regards himself as a rubber stamp, or that Senator Olson feels that way or Senator Everett, or Senator Argue, or Senator Smith, who happens to be a distinguished member of the opposition, or Senator Goldenberg, or Senator van Roggen, or Senator Bonnell. Nor do I think ministers from the other place who argue their legislation before any of our committees think that this place is a rubber stamp. Indeed, I have served in a legislature and I have served in the House of Commons, and the best committee work in Canada is done right here in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Then why does the government condemn you?

Senator Perrault: The best government reports in the country are produced right here in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Then why does the government condemn you?

Senator Perrault: Nobody can say that the Minister of Public Works was in total agreement with the recent report of the National Finance Committee presented by Senator Everett.

Senator Flynn: Agreed!

Senator Perrault: Has there ever been a comparable Commons report which discussed in such frank terms the allocation of public funds in the matter of renting and buying space in this country—a report which cost the Canadian people $76,000? That $76,000 will ultimately save millions of dollars for the Canadian taxpayers.

Senator Grosart: It was rejected by the Minister of Public Works.

Senator Perrault: That one report alone may save the cost of much of the Senate for some time. It is time we started telling the Canadian people about some of the work done here. It is time for the media, who purport to tell what is going on in Ottawa, to begin to report what happens here.

When there was a Conservative government in power did the Liberal majority in this place obstruct or vote against the policies of the elected body? Now the Leader of the Opposition seems to find it reprehensible that people who are proud to be Liberals usually do not delay inordinately important legislation when it is presented by their own government. I would remind honourable senators and members of the media that last session alone the Senate of Canada amended 204 times the measures which came before it, which indicates that this is anything but a supine body of rubber-stamping sycophants.

Is it so strange that this chamber regards itself as a body with a real responsibility to act on behalf of the Canadian people? When the Senate was brought into existence as a body of "sober, second thought," it was established to reinforce regional interests and to protect Canadians against an over-weening use of power.

Speaking of Senate voting patterns, one can imagine the protest which would have come from the Conservatives had the Liberal majority, back in the days of the Diefenbaker government, frustrated the work of the Commons. I am sure the Conservative government would have called it "interference with the wishes of the elected majority." Yet even then the Senate, made up mostly of Liberals, acted to improve measures which came before it. Now we are accused of being rubber stamps because senators on most occasions adopt the same attitude now as then with respect to legislation which comes from the elected chamber—an attitude which says, “We do not wish to frustrate the will of the people, as represented by the elected members of Parliament, but we shall ensure that when proposed legislation finally becomes law it is the soundest possible legislation that can be developed, and protects fully the public interest.”

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: I am interested at times in some of the statements made—and there are people of all parties making them—that somehow the Senate does not reflect and it does not represent adequately the regional interest.

Senator Flynn: That is the government's position.

Senator Perrault: That is not the essence of the government's position. In any case, government supporters here are not required to march in lock step with some policy pronouncement issued by some government department or the Privy Council. Discussion and dialogue are invited and encouraged.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Did I hear you correctly?

Senator Perrault: Let us put this on the record. I say it again, that supporters here are not required to march in lock step with some policy czar in the Liberal Party. Of course not.

Senator Flynn: But you are one.

Senator Perrault: All of us support the idea of increasing and improving regional representation, but of the 93 appointed senators, six are former provincial premiers, nine are former opposition leaders, 20 are former members of provincial legislatures, and 16 are former members of federal cabinets. Also there are many former mayors, councillors, members of the House of Commons, and other people with a profound knowledge of regional interests. Yet the statement is made at times that we need something more representative.

Senator Flynn: It is in the white paper. I did not invent it.

Senator Perrault: I do not reject the idea—no one should reject the idea—of having this body more representative. As I have said, the idea has merit, but Canadians should be made aware of the present representative nature of the Senate before we consider ways in which that representation can be improved—and it can be improved.

Senator Walker: The Prime Minister would abolish it. You know that.

Senator Perrault: The next few months are certain to be a time of particular interest for all of us in this chamber. Last session over 200 amendments were made to measures which came before us. There were also an unprecedented number of committee meetings. Many valuable studies were initiated, undertaken or completed. Presented by Senator van Roggen, the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee on Canada-United States Relations has been extremely well received. It has inspired renewed interest in the vital issue of trade within North America. There was a solidly researched and far-reaching report presented by the National Finance Committee, and excellent reports from the Agriculture Committee. The report on the Public Works Department, prepared by the National Finance Committee, was well received. In addition, Senate representatives distinguished themselves on the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution. I know that the report of our own Special Committee on the Constitution, chaired by—Senator Flynn: Did you say all that in cabinet?

Senator Perrault: Some day years from now the record may well show just how much I did say in cabinet. I know that the report of our own Special Committee on the Constitution, chaired by Senator Stanbury, will be read with interest and it will represent a real contribution to the Constitution dialogue. Senator Hayden's Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has been the subject of much deserved editorial praise. Senator McGrand's and Senator Argue's committee's will continue with their important work in the coming months, and Senator Croll's special committee will bring to the people of Canada an awareness of the important work conducted by the Senate as it studies the subject of retirement policies.

In the coming months the Senate will continue to be of great service to the people of Canada. Certainly the resources of a second chamber are required by this nation more than ever before.

In conclusion, the abilities of honourable senators and our fellow members of Parliament in the other place will be factors in the coming months in the battle against inflation and its related evils, and all of the other economic problems which beset us. The resources of Parliament, indeed of all sectors of society, will be needed. The heavy artillery of the Bank of Canada, to use a military analogy, must retain its position and use its effective fire power. To continue this analogy, the front line must be broadened. This front line must involve people of all our provinces, of all political persuasion, of every occupational grouping. It must involve those in business, industry, the trade unions, agriculture, the service industries, and those who serve in political life.

Surely our problems in Canada are very much ethical and social problems. There are no easy, quick and simple solutions to be found. Surely all of us Canadians must realize that inflation is the way in which a national economy reacts to continuous overstraining of its strength, to demands which are unmeasured and insistent, to a tendency toward excess in every sphere and in all circles, and to a degree of overconfidence resulting in illusory attempts to draw bigger cheques on the national economy than it can honour; and, as one author wrote, to a perverse desire always to be combining incompatibles.

People want to invest more than savings permit. They demand wages higher than the growth of productivity justifies. They want to consume more than current income allows. They want to turn into imports for the national economy more than the exports earned; and, above all, governments at all levels, which should know better and have positions of leadership, have at times in the past placed inordinately high claims on an already overstretched economy. There is a riot of claims and an insufficiency of goods produced for the necessary cover. As I have said, the government is taking fast action against the problem.

In the past, one of the results of this process has been an enfeeblement of money; and it is not good enough to say that Canada is doing better than most other countries. That process is under way in our own nation, despite all efforts to combat it. It is an enfeeblement of money which, in a sense, ceases to resist, and it is this enfeeblement which we call inflation and which is having such a disrupting effect on our economy today.

But there are brakes and counterforces, honourable senators, and some are affecting Canada today. One brake and counterforce is a government—I suggest that many members of the opposition may wish to be involved in this process—willing to support restraint measures and economic initiatives, some of which may result in political unpopularity. Indeed, it has been said that one of the costs to governments of effectively combatting inflation and coming to grips finally with inextinguishable economic dilemmas is, all too often, the loss of political power.

Honourable senators, I know you will agree with me when I say that the future welfare of this country is infinitely more important than whether the Liberal, Conservative, New Democratic, or any other party wins or loses the next election—and in saying this I am not preparing a scenario for the defeat of this government. But I think that we who are in government and all those with a sense of parliamentary responsibility must be prepared to adopt, as the government is doing today, those measures that will advance the common welfare, regardless of political consequences. Hopefully, in the process the people of Canada will recognize where their true welfare lies and will reward with political support those who serve in government and Parliament, if they are prepared to act in this disciplined and responsible fashion.

The results of the election the other day reflect in very large measure, in my view, the unhappiness and dissatisfaction of a great many Canadians with regard to the tough and unpopular policies adopted by the government, policies which, however, are clearly in the long-term interests of Canada. If we become deserters in this battle against inflation, if we fail to oppose the spirit which nourishes and accepts it, we will really be collaborating, in causing the decay in this country of respect for the law and of the law itself. It requires no special genius to realize that the vanishing respect for property is very much related to the numbing of respect for the integrity of money and its value. Laxity with regard to property and to money, and the need to improve our productivity and economic performance, regardless of our place in society, are all very closely bound up together. In all of these cases what is firm, durable, earned, secured and designed for continuity, gives place to what is fragile, fugitive, fleeting, unsure and ephemeral, and that is not the kind of foundation on which a free society like that of Canada, which we have enjoyed for so many years, can continue to stand.

[Senator Perrault.]

The Speech from the Throne, honourable senators, reflects the determination of the government to fight effectively against inflation by strengthening both the economy, through some of the measures I have spoken about, and national unity. I urge support for the motion which is currently before the Senate.

Senator Flynn: The PMO did not write that speech.

On motion of Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, a meeting of this committee has been called, and the members will assemble in room 356-S, as soon as the chamber goes back into Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to.

POSTAL SERVICES CONTINUATION BILL

FURTHER CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate adjourned during pleasure and was put into Committee of the Whole to further consider Bill C-8, intituled: "An Act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services," the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C., in the Chair.

Pursuant to rule 18 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable André Ouellet, P.C., Minister of State for Urban Affairs and Acting Minister of Labour, was escorted to a seat in the Senate Chamber.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is again in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-8, intituled: "An Act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services."

Honourable senators, we are probably going to have royal assent around 5.30, so I would allow two or three other members to ask questions of a general nature, and then, with the agreement of all senators, we will start the clause-by-clause examination of the bill. Is that agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Molson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question in connection with the offences prescribed in this bill. I am a little puzzled in this regard. In a situation where an organization of employees, or a union, is created by law, and the means of certification of such a union is provided by law, why, when there is a suggestion of disobeying the law, is there no provision for decertification? The law, of course, may be obeyed implicitly and completely, and therefore be no problem; but in the event that there should be disobedience of the law, why do we not adopt the simple process of decertifying the organization concerned?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, the information I have received is that decertification is carried out only at the request of the members of the union themselves. To envisage such an extreme measure would be considered as inviting general disobedience, which could create chaos, because in that case a union would no longer have leaders to talk to. It has therefore not been considered, with regard to any agreement that has been contemplated, that that recourse ought to be adopted.

Senator Roblin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask for clarification on a couple of points. I notice that the collective agreement we are talking about is the one that expired on June 30, 1977, and that it proposed to extend the term of this agreement for another two and a half years from the date of its expiration. I wonder if the minister would care to comment on the significance of this very long term.

Secondly, in connection with the point raised by Senator Greene concerning the right to terminate, the minister told us that this was covered by the Public Service Staff Relations Act. I am wondering, however, whether the old agreement that we are now extending for two and a half years does not itself contain clauses with respect to termination of employment resulting from failure to comply with a collective agreement. Perhaps the minister could clarify whether that agreement does not supersede whatever is contained in the Public Service Employment Act.

I should also ask the minister to explain to me the implications of clause 8, which subjects the proceedings under this bill to the Anti-Inflation Act and the guidelines established thereunder. Just what does this mean in connection with the size of the increase that may be given to employees under the arbitration or mediation clause?

Perhaps I could put all my questions on the table now. I would also refer to clause 10 where a set of fines is set out for people who do not do what they should do. The clause refers to sections in the Public Service Staff Relations Act, which is not before us and with which I am not acquainted. What I really want to know is, under clause 10(1)(a) who pays? If the same thing applies to the penalties under paragraph (b), against whom are these directed? As I read this in a very cursory fashion, I wonder whether these changes are specific to this act or whether they are really of general application as we are amending the Public Service Staff Relations Act. I am a little confused as to whether there is an item of general application here or not.

I would conclude by offering a comment on the proceedings under the mediator-arbitrator. After having listened to the extensive efforts made to find agreement over many months with a sort of abject and complete and utter failure to agree on anything, so far as my recollection goes, I feel it is probably pretty optimistic to think that in the next 90 days a mediator is going to achieve any better results. We might as well expect that the bulk of the matters in dispute will certainly come under arbitration. There will be an arbitral award. I would certainly agree with the amendment of the other place extending the 90-day term if the parties or the minister think it advisable to do so.

I just wonder how the minister contemplates the outcome of this matter. All these points have to go to binding arbitration. There are so many of them, particularly all these outstanding grievances, that some pretty broad strokes will have to be applied to the whole of this problem. I wonder how the minister envisages matters proceeding after the arbitration is in. These people are going to be tied up now for another year and a half under this arrangement, and I really wonder whether peace and quiet is going to reign over all that period of time, when practically every one of these things is going to be settled by binding arbitration and be subject to the guidelines under the Anti-Inflation Act.

I must say that I congratulate the minister on his optimism if he thinks this is going to produce the kind of peace and quiet that we would hope for in the future. However, I hope I am a pessimist and that he is right, because that would be much better in the public interest.

I would appreciate some comment on these points.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, referring to the various points brought forward by the honourable senator, I should like, first of all, to refer to clause 5. The terms of the collective agreement to which this act applies are, first of all, the terms of the collective agreement that has been under discussion by the two parties—that is, from July 1, 1977 up to December 31, 1978. That is the magnitude of the current negotiations up to now.

In light of the fact that we are almost at the end of the year 1978, we have decided to introduce a clause in this bill that extends the actual collective agreement under discussion and make it continue for one year. The reason for doing so is that we believe that the mediator-arbitrator will not solve this issue in a few days and, therefore, we are giving him three months to come forward with a new collective agreement. This will mean that when he does come forward with his new collective agreement, the current collective agreement will have finished, if we respect the date of December 31, 1978. Therefore, the union would already have been in a position—in fact, they could start in a few weeks—to give notice of the new demands for the new contract. We have just decided to extend this current contract to December 31, 1979, hoping that in the meantime we will ensure uninterrupted postal services during the course of 1979. At the same time, this will allow the appropriate time to permit this transition period of the planned conversion of the Post Office to a crown corporation. This is why we are dealing with the current collective agreement that should normally end on December 31, 1978, and which, under this bill, will be extended to December 31, 1979.

In relation to penalties, these are exclusively applicable to this bill for those employees who fall under the terms of this bill. Therefore, we are not amending the Public Service Staff Relations Act, which covers all the other employees of the government but exclusively those who will be guided by this piece of legislation.

In relation to clause 8, I refer to the Anti-Inflation Act. It is obvious that for the part of the contract that will go from July, 1977, to December, 1978, the Anti-Inflation Act will apply. We are not in a position to say at this very moment what the term of the contract will be because that will be the role of the mediator-arbitrator through his mediations or, if he does not succeed through his mediations, through his own power as an arbitrator to set the term of the collective agreement that will be in force for the current time and up to 1979.

We are saying by this act that this mediator-arbitrator is bound by the rules and regulations of the Anti-Inflation Act for the first part of the contract, but he is obviously not under the same constraint for the latter part of the contract.

The honourable senator asked in his final intervention what would happen after arbitration is in. He made a comment that he feels that because of the nature of the relationship between the employers and the employees in the Post Office, the chances are pretty slim that this mediator-arbitrator will be able to mediate anything. This technique of a mediator with a power of arbitration has shown, in cases where this technique has been used, pretty impressive success in the sense that the mediator is there discussing the situation with the parties, and the parties know that if they do not co-operate and do not bring forward positive and constructive suggestions and attitudes in the course of that mediation chaired by this person, this very person has the right and the power to come forward at a later date as an arbitrator and bring in any findings or recommendations.

He is a unique mediator in the sense that he is not only mediating but has some clout to bring the parties to an agreement. I therefore hope and believe that a substantial part of the issues at stake here could be mediated, and hopefully only a small part of the other issues will have to be left in the hands of this person, who will then exercise his right of mediation. The result will be the collective agreement; his conclusions will become the effective collective agreement that will be binding on both parties.

Senator Roblin: I thank the minister. He has cleared up a number of points for me. I should like to go back to clause 10, because I am curious to know about the fines. Under subclause (1)(a) we will fine somebody $100 for doing something. What is that all about? In paragraph (b) we are fining somebody $300 for doing something else. The bill does not say what the offence is or who the penalty is directed against. Could I please have some explanation of that?

[Mr. Ouellet.]

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I am sorry that I forgot to answer this question. As I indicated earlier, the amendments to section 101 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act are in line with the recommendation of the joint committee that the penalties under that act were not up to twentieth century standards and ought to be increased in order to be more realistically in line with day-to-day life. These amendments, therefore, increase the penalties already prescribed under section 101 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. With reference to paragraph (a), in the Public Service Staff Relations Act the penalty was $100, but it will now be $100 per day for an employee.

Senator Roblin: For disobedience?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: For disobedience.

Senator Roblin: Disobedience on the part of a single employee?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Disobedience on the part of a single employee. Referring to paragraph (b), the penalty used to be $300 and will now be $2,500 for a union leader plus a penalty of $250 for each day of disobedience. Paragraph (b) refers to a union leader. Paragraph (c) refers to the union, to the local. The penalty used to be $150, and it is now the aggregate of $10,000 and/or $1,000 per day for the local.

Senator Bosa: Mr. Minister, having shared office space with you at one time, when we both had different responsibilities, may I say that you look very good as a frontbencher in this honourable chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: He has no future here.

Senator Bosa: My question concerns the extent to which the leaders of the postal union rely on the government to legislate them back to work so that they can look good to their membership, and can look tough and appear to be presenting a hard line in their negotiating approach. In other words, given the present psychological climate in Canada, would they have risked a prolonged strike were it not for the fact that they knew you would legislate them back to work? Secondly, it seems to me that the main bone of contention is not so much the salary increases the unions are requesting as the fear of job displacement because of automation. Could you comment on that?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: It is very difficult for me to analyze the thinking of the union leaders. I can only say I very much regret that the offers made through the auspices of the Department of Labour were turned down. We have tried our utmost to bring about a negotiated settlement. We provided what we felt were opportunities for the union leaders to show some leadership to bring about a negotiated settlement. Unfortunately, apparently the union considered they would probably be able to exercise more clout if they were in a strike position. That is their own decision. Obviously I cannot comment, except to say that I regret this very much, because I believe their objective could best have been accomplished, not under duress of a strike but through the offer of mediation by the Department of Labour.

You are quite right in saying that the financial implications of the collective agreement are considered a less important point than the question of job security and the implementation of technological change. It seems to me that this is a more important element conducive to settlement.

I would remind honourable senators that a few years ago all the Post Office employees received a written assurance from the then President of the Treasury Board that no one working for the Post Office would lose his job because of technological change and automation being implemented in the Post Office. This guarantee of job security is there and is part and parcel of the overall operation. However, for one reason or another it has been felt by the union leaders throughout the years that this guarantee is not enough for them, and it is a bone of contention. I do not know what more could be done than give those guarantees. It is a question of faith. To my knowledge, no one has yet lost his job in the Post Office because of the introduction of machines to speed up the process of mail delivery. Some employees have been transferred to other jobs, but nobody has been put out of employment because of automation.

Senator Bosa: I have a supplementary question. Mr. Parrot, in a television interview this morning, said that perhaps the union might defy the back-to-work legislation. Clause 10 of the bill imposes a fine of $100 per day if it is contravened. When the interviewer mentioned that, Mr. Parrot said that the members of his union do not have that kind of money. Hypothetically, then, if all the strikers do not comply with the back-to-work legislation, and they do not have the means to pay the fine, would there be enough space in Canadian prisons to accommodate 22,000 people?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: As you describe it yourself, it is a hypothetical question. I can assure you that there is space for 22,000 people to work in the Post Office.

The Chairman: Shall we now consider the bill clause by clause?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Clause 2. Shall clause 2 carry?

Senator Grosart: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister to clarify these various agreements with which we are concerned. The definition of collective agreement in clause 2 refers to an agreement which expired on June 30, 1977. My understanding is that the terms of this agreement are now extended for two-and-a-half years. Am I correct in that assumption? They are extended to December 31, 1979. There is then reference to another agreement. It is called an agreement, but it may not be a signed agreement. Clause 8 reads:

—a collective agreement entered into between the employee organization and the employer applicable for that portion of the period specified in section 5 that ends December 31, 1978.

Is there an agreement subsequent to the one ending in 1977 that would end December 31, 1978? Is such an agreement in effect?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: In the last month the parties have been negotiating a collective agreement from July 1, 1977 to December 31, 1978. That agreement falls under the AIB, and that is what is referred to in clause 8.

Senator Grosart: I am aware of that. Please answer my question. Is such an agreement in effect now?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: No.

Senator Grosart: That is the answer I want.

Senator Hicks: Surely it comes into effect now because of clause 5.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Grosart: Granted that, then what demands of the union or the employer could come under the mediator-arbitrator? Obviously those negotiations going forward on the agreement which would end in 1978 would come under it. But we are told there are non-bargainable items which are still in dispute.

Will the minister explain to us what demands, in general, not in particular, will come within the purview of the mediator-arbitrator, and what is the status of the items called non-bargainable which, according to my understanding, cannot be negotiated until such time as the crown corporation is set up? When the crown corporation is set up—and the suggestion is that that may be a half year from now—are all those non-bargainable items then before the mediator-arbitrator?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: No. Mr. Chairman, in clause 6(1)(a)(i), we describe the items that are before the mediator-arbitrator, and they are those that have been referred to the conciliation board established by the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board. Those items ruled out as non-negotiable by the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board are not now before the mediator-arbitrator. Items that are non-negotiable cannot be part of this collective agreement that will be enshrined by this legislation.

Senator Grosart: The government has indicated the target date of perhaps the middle of next year to set up the crown corporation. In that event, my understanding is that the whole matter of industrial relations between the new employer, the crown corporation, and the employees would then come under the Canada Labour Code. Would that mean that these non-bargainable items would then be before another tribunal at the same time that the bargainable items are before the mediator-arbitrator?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Let us assume that the crown corporation, as the honourable senator expects, could be created by the middle of next year. This collective agreement will end December 31, 1979. That means by the end of next year the employees will be starting to discuss with their employers a new collective agreement. If we create this crown corporation, the clause stipulates that the employees will no longer be under the Public Service Staff Relations Act but will now fall under the Canada Labour Code, and then these items could be on the next collective agreement after December 31, 1979, and could be bargainable and could be part of the new collective agreement in the future.

Senator Grosart: But they could not be included in any award made by the mediator-arbitrator.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: No.

The Chairman: Clause 2. Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 3. Shall clause 3 carry?

Senator Grosart: Not too fast, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Macdonald: Clause 3 states that each officer or representative shall give notice to the employees concerned. Just what does that mean? Does the signature of each officer have to be attached to the notice ordering the men back to work?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: That is a standard clause that, in fact, gives some directives to the representatives of the employers and the employees. It is a standard clause that you see in all these bills.

Senator Macdonald: Actually, the authorized officers would sign that.

Senator Grosart: Under the provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, is a directive from union headquarters in respect to work-to-rule prohibited? I know there are deliberate slow-downs, and so on, that are prohibited. Is there a prohibition against a work-to-rule directive from union headquarters?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I think the honourable senator can find the answer in the Public Service Staff Relations Act where it defines a strike. You will find that on page 5 of the act.

Senator Grosart: Is the minister saying it does prohibit the work-to-rule directive?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: I suspect that if it goes to court, it will be up to the judge, reading the definition and comparing the circumstances, to pass judgment on that. I believe the definition of "strike" in the Public Service Staff Relations Act is wide enough.

● (1640)

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Clause 4. Shall clause 4 carry?

[Translation]

Senator Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I have only one question on clause 4 which deals with disciplinary measures.

Does it mean that no disciplinary measures will be taken, no matter what the strikers may have done before the coming into force of this act? Does that cover everything?

[Mr. Ouellet.]

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Yes, I think that this clause is very clear and that it indicates precisely that the employer has no recourse against employees who have exercised their right to strike.

[English]

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Senator Macdonald: Would the arbitrator have the power to make the increase in wages retroactive to July 1, 1977?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Yes.

Senator Grosart: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister to explain any difference in meaning between the phrase "arbitral award", which, for quick reference, appears on page 3, line 12 and lines 33 and 34, and the phrase "provisional award." It appears the mediator-arbitrator may be, under certain circumstances, required to render an arbitral award, but also has the power to render a provisional award. What is the distinction?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: An amendment was accepted last evening while discussing the bill in the other place to the effect that the mediator-arbitrator, during the course of his mediation, might decide early in his work to give a provisional award in order to create a better climate. In other words, he would not have to wait for the 90 days as prescribed in the bill. He would decide to award immediately on some questions before him.

Senator Grosart: If that were the meaning, would it not be better to use the term "interim award"? I am interested in the real meaning of this.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: In the true sense of the word, it is an arbitral award, but an arbitral award that does not come after 90 days. It could come after 10 or 20 days. It was suggested in the other place that we use the term "provisional award", and I suspect it would be provisional in the sense that it will be there after 10 or 20 days but would be confirmed in the arbitral award after the 90 days.

Senator Grosart: Or it might not be confirmed.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister if the final decision of the mediator-arbitrator is binding on the government?

Has it ever happened that the government did agree in advance to abide by a decision of an arbitrator inasmuch as the salaries of its employees were concerned? I understand for instance that railways workers or others have been told they had to submit to compulsory arbitration. But did the government ever accept in advance the decision of a third party, namely the arbitrator?

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Apparently, it is a first.

Senator Flynn: I suspected it.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: It is the first time indeed that the government legislates in such a manner regarding its own employees and accepts in advance to abide by the arbitrator's decisions which will be binding.

Senator Flynn: It is because I know that the government has always made the serious objection that it cannot accept compulsory arbitration because one cannot bind in advance the government to the decision of an arbitrator. I think that this creates a precedent—perhaps not a bad one but it may be also that the government will eventually regret it. In any event, if you are willing to take this chance, we are prepared to let you do so.

[English]

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Senator Grosart: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister to explain the reason for the delay in the coming into force of this bill if it receives royal assent? According to clause 11 it does not come into force until the day after it is assented to. I would say "royal assent," but the new terminology is "assented to."

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: One of the obvious reasons is to give the unions time to communicate this to their membership. Obviously, this legislation has to be given royal assent and this has to be made known. This will give time to the union leaders so that they can communicate this to their membership, and will allow television, radio and newspapers to communicate this to the unions.

Senator Flynn: Last evening we were in a difficult position. If the bill had reached us at 11.30 and we had been able to—I do not wish to use the words—go through it very quickly, the bill would have received royal assent at five minutes to twelve. Members of the union concerned would have had five minutes to return to work. Someone even suggested that after 12 o'clock they would have been in bed illegally.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, in the name of honourable senators I wish to thank you for the information you have given us. I hope that staff relations in the Post Office will eventually improve.

Hon. Mr. Ouellet: Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the short title of the bill in clause 1 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (1650)

The Hon. the Speaker: The sitting is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Senator Bourget: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-8, to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services, has considered this bill and has the honour to report the same without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, with leave, I move third reading now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Before the bill receives third reading, I want to place on record the fact that we could hardly have accomplished last night, had we carried on at that time, what we have been able to accomplish since 11 o'clock this morning.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, October 24, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Greene: Honourable senators, on a question of privilege—

Senator Flynn: Not at this time.

Senator Greene: A question of privilege can be raised at any time. I believe that even a minor question of privilege has priority over any other business and should be brought forward at the first possible opportunity.

This is not a very serious one, honourable senators, but I note in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of Wednesday, October 18, 1978, that my name is spelled incorrectly.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Greene: Now that we are all punching timeclocks here and our attendance is necessary in order to draw our stipend, I thought it might be relevant and I thought it my responsibility to bring this to your attention, honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: "Responsibility" would not be the correct word.

ADJOURNMENT MOTION ADOPTED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator McDonald, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, October 24, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like to tell you briefly, as well as I can at this time, what work we shall have in the Senate next week.

The first report of the Committee of Selection, which was presented today, has been placed on the order paper for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate. On Tuesday, Senator McDonald will move adoption of that report. As soon as the report is adopted, the Clerk of the Senate will be in a position to call an organization meeting to appoint the chairmen of the various select committees of the Senate. Also on Tuesday the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution, which was tabled today, will be taken into consideration. In addition, the Throne Speech debate will continue next week and on Tuesday and Wednesday of the following week.

We shall probably proceed with second reading of the four government bills on the order paper on Wednesday next. However, if second reading of these four bills takes too much time, we may have to suspend the Throne Speech debate for that day.

There are no committee meetings scheduled for next week. The Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution is the only committee reconstituted to date this session.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE

DISRUPTION IN SERVICE—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the deputy leader if he has any news concerning the situation in the Post Office, and if Parliament's decision is being respected? If not, what does the government intend to do?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, the only information I have is that which everybody heard this morning on the radio, and it is that, apparently, almost all workers in Montreal are defying the law, whereas in Ontario some employees have returned to work.

I am following the situation very closely, and I shall be pleased to transmit to the Senate any further information I may receive.

[English]

Senator Olson: A supplementary question. May I ask the Acting Leader of the Government whether a report is being made in the House of Commons at this time regarding the cabinet's deliberations on this matter? News broadcasts state that the cabinet is considering what further action might be required.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I regret that I have nothing to report on this matter at this time.

Senator Greene: A supplementary question. It was reported in this morning's press that Mr. Parrot had instructed his charges not to obey the act. Can the Acting Leader of the Government inform us whether that is correct, and, if it is correct, what action is the government taking pursuant to the act to see to it that this conduct, which is flagrantly contrary to the terms of the act, is prosecuted?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, as I said, I have to rely on press and radio reports. These reports confirm that such instructions have been issued by Mr. Parrot. However, as to the possible action by the government, this matter is under very active consideration but no decision has yet been taken.

Senator Flynn: We understand that these instructions given by Mr. Parrot were expressed before the act came into force.

Senator Langlois: These instructions were given almost a week before the legislation was placed before Parliament.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT PRICE AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA RESPECTING CRUDE OIL—FURTHER QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, may I ask the Acting Leader of the Government whether he has an answer to the question I asked yesterday regarding crude oil prices in Canada?

Senator Langlois: That is a complex question to deal with, but I shall undertake to follow developments and inform the Senate as soon as I have the necessary information.

THE SENATE

ALLEGED DELAY IN CONSIDERATION OF POSTAL SERVICES CONTINUATION BILL—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. With leave of the Senate, I should like to inform the house of an article appearing in the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday, October 18, under the heading "Senators wouldn't rush". The article states:

The Senate refused early this morning to rush through legislation forcing inside postal workers back to work, thus giving the union and the government an extra 24 hours to try to reach a negotiated settlement.

Accusing the government of 'trying to make a fool of the Senate,' Opposition Leader Jacques Flynn withheld the unanimous consent necessary to pass the bill through all three stages in one sitting.

The Senate resumed debate today on second reading—approval in principle—of the bill. Several Opposition MPs felt the delay by the Senate had been carefully engineered by the government to give both sides in the dispute some breathing room.

Senator Flynn: They certainly did not use me.

Senator Langlois: I shall not carry on reading this inaccurate and misleading article.

[Senator Langlois.]

The Leader of the Opposition went on the radio yesterday morning to explain exactly what took place in the Senate and to make it clear that there was no undue delay by the Senate in dealing with this measure. The reason given, of course, was that the bill came to the Senate just before midnight on Tuesday. There was no foundation whatsoever for the contention by some M.P.s that the delay in passage of this bill by the Senate was the result of a joint action by the Senate and the government so as to give some breathing time to both sides in the dispute. Such an interpretation is absolutely false, and I trust that the Leader of the Opposition will confirm that.

Senator Flynn: I certainly would take exception to any contention that I would have anything to do with any scheme of the government's. I would be the last one to be involved in such doings, I can assure you.

Senator Langlois: I was quite sure your answer would be just that.

Senator Grosart: He does not want his integrity compromised.

Senator Greene: It is even a Tory paper.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Rizzuto, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bird, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to His Speech at the opening of the session.—(Honourable Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche)).

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, because Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche) is not prepared to speak this afternoon, I would ask leave for Senator Claude Wagner to resume the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Claude Wagner: Honourable senators, this is the first time I have taken part in the Throne Speech debate in this House and if rumours concerning the possible demise of this great forum are true, this will be both the first and the last time.

Honourable senators, before submitting to you a few thoughts which came to my mind as a result of the political atmosphere in Canada, I should like to express my respect for His Excellency the Governor General and Madame Léger, my admiration to the Speaker, whose dedication and grace are obvious to everyone, my regards for the leaders of the government and of the official opposition whose welcome made me feel at ease, and finally my greatest appreciation to the mover and seconder of the Throne Speech debate who gave remarkable performances.

[English]

During the past few years it has become increasingly obvious that Canada has entered a period of deep social, political and economic difficulties. The signs of impending and existing crises are apparent on all fronts—a pitiable dollar, high inflation, high unemployment, and continuing political uncertainty over Quebec. These and other ills increasingly dominate the headlines and national consciousness. But to what effect? Has the news of these foreboding circumstances increased the nation's understanding of their underlying causes or of the needed solutions? I fear not.

Instead of demonstrating a renewed will and determination to seek and implement necessary answers, the collective national reaction has underscored a far greater national problem: Canadian society's chronic inability to face difficult choices or to institute necessary change.

Remember that our problems of unity and economy didn't occur overnight. The dismal state of affairs is the direct result of years of foolish lethargy. In effect, Canadians are beginning to pay the piper for past failures to deal with several of the fundamental issues facing their society.

Two years ago the foundations of this nation were shaken by the election of the Parti Québécois government. With that election all Canadians were forced, at least briefly, to face the stark reality of a unity crisis that has been simmering for decades. For a short time I felt that Premier Levesque's election would act as a positive force for Canada, by instilling in Canadians a newly aroused determination to find the solutions necessary for making our country work.

I expected the new awareness of an old crisis to act as an inspiration. I awaited with expectation the emergence of prominent figures, particularly in English Canada, to lead this nation in a renewed self-examination. Alas, I was doomed to disappointment. For a brief time there was a flurry of debate and soul-searching; a few commissions were formed, a few new magazines appeared—but their endeavours failed to make a lasting impression. For, in a sadly typical fashion, Canadians did not fully confront the newly accentuated crisis, but instead came to accept it as a tolerable reality. Once aware that the new circumstances would have no immediately disastrous effects, Canadian society reassumed its normal characteristics, following its traditional pattern of ignoring problems and resenting the solutions.

How does a nation come to develop such an inability to cope with fundamental problems? In Canada's case, it has resulted in part from the society's loss of overriding natural goals and the citizens' loss of concern for the national good. From its inception, Canada was by nature a cautious, conservative nation. It was, after all, born out of its citizens' steadfast refusal to participate in the great experiment south of the border. That refusal, however, was not simply a negative action; it was instead a positive reaffirmation by Canadians of both British and French ancestry of their love of and loyalty to their distinctive heritages and cultures. In the process they launched a great experiment of their own, creating a federation of two cultural and linguistic groups, a federation which spanned a continent and dwarfed the motherlands of Europe.

Yet how very sharply that early courage and determination contrasts with the mood in Canada today. In the intervening years, Canada developed an affluence and standard of living rivalled by few countries in the world. Yet economic growth has been accompanied by a decline in the importance of the nation's original goals. In English Canada concern over the preservation of a distinctive cultural identity has close to vanished. Patriotic ideals have been replaced with an obsessive and all-consuming desire to maintain and augment the level of affluence and luxury.

A no-questions-asked approach was adopted concerning the methods by which our nation maintained its affluence. There were, of course, numerous warnings, warnings from economists and analysts, warnings about the inevitably negative impact of unchecked foreign investment, of endlessly higher wage demands, of deficit financing and the constant decline in domestic research and development spending and facilities. The many symptoms of Canada's current economic malaise have been apparent for years.

Nevertheless, Canadians managed to disregard those symptoms, adopting the attitude that no problem was too big to be ignored. When serious study and even more serious choices were needed, Canadians remained woefully unprepared to fully recognize the problems, let alone the necessary solutions.

In large part, responsibility for the citizens' failure to come to grips with national problems rests with two of our nation's major institutions.

For far too long the political parties have exploited and encouraged the average citizen's reluctance to face difficult choices. Too often parties have found it expedient to minimize or "trivialize" the problems, to offer palatably easy solutions instead of difficult but necessary ones.

On the few occasions when political leaders have attempted to draw the citizens' attention to the need for important action, they have found that their efforts rendered them extremely vulnerable to the attacks of their political opponents. Robert Stanfield's ill-deserved fate in the 1974 election was eloquent evidence of the reward reserved for political leaders who attempt to place before Canadians solutions to the serious problems affecting the country. Mr. Stanfield's proposal of wage and price controls was, of course, a serious effort to solve an equally serious economic problem. Yet it was immediately attacked and distorted by his political opponents. It became a political disaster. Thus the other parties portrayed the proposal as damaging and unnecessary. As is characteristic of such situations, they offered no real alternative, limiting themselves instead to criticism of the proposals and assurances to Canadians that the situation did not warrant such drastic measures.

Canadians accepted those assurances, choosing to reward those politicians who continued to suggest that the nation's difficulties were not so serious as to require that its citizens discard their characteristic complacency, or their unjustified expectations of simply acquired and ever-increasing prosperity.

The situation in 1974 was by no means unique. Even today, as the nation staggers toward the still uncertain culmination of the unity crisis, there are those politicians who have found it expedient to deliberately downplay the truly perilous nature of that crisis; to convince Canadians that they could once again afford to place the whole issue of French-English relations and of constitutional reform on a back burner. Instead of assuming their proper role as a force in the unity debate, these politicians, federal or provincial, deliberately devote their full attention to convincing Canadians that the real and exclusive issue is the economy. They are also heard to propose to Canadians the cozy suggestion that finding a solution to the nation's economic woes would, in large part, solve the unity crisis.

Recent polls, which place the issue of national unity low on English Canadians' minds, indicate this tactic has worked. Once again political strategists have lulled Canadians into dangerous complacency. Once again, instead of urging Canadians to accept and examine the seriousness of a deep-seated and long-standing crisis, certain politicians invite them to ignore it. And once again Canadians have willingly accepted the perverse implication that this nation can continue to coast along free from the need to come to grips with problems which threaten it with disintegration and ruin.

However, I must note that the politicians have not been alone in encouraging the general public's desire to avoid the pondering of the hard choices necessary for the nation's continued well-being. The press has also contributed enormously to Canadians' basic unpreparedness.

In a recent commencement address at Harvard University, Alexander Solzhenitsyn, Russian author and exile, noted—and I underline this quotation:

Hastiness and superficiality are the psychic disease of the 20th century and more than anywhere else this disease is reflected in the press. In-depth analysis of a problem is anathema to the press. It stops at sensational formulas. Such as it is, however, the press has become the greatest power within the western societies—more powerful than the legislature, the executive and the judiciary. One would then like to ask by what law has it been elected and to whom is it responsible? In the Communist east, a journalist is frankly appointed as a state official, but who has granted western journalists their power? For how long a time and with what prerogatives?

In Canada, the media exercises the crucial role of gatekeeper of public knowledge and information. It is journalists' judgments which decide the priority and attention to be paid to issues and to statements of governments and public figures. Through this extraordinary power, the media are able to influence, indeed determine, the public's preoccupations and concerns. Yet given this power, what criteria do the media use in exercising it? As already noted, in-depth analysis is anathema to the news media. Indeed the very term "news" underlines the media's preoccupation with new occurrences and with newly unfolding events.

In many traditional journalists' minds, their job is to report the news. An issue remains news only as long as it generates new sensational developments. Thus, if the issue fails to do so, then the media's attention soon turns elsewhere, to the latest jet set gossip or international crisis. Of course, in the process, the media also directs the public's attention away from that issue, not because the issue has been resolved or even fully examined, but rather because it has ceased to be "news". In this fashion, commercially based news criteria, preoccupied with the sensational and superficial, have come to dominate the fashion in which our society views and deals with its problems.

Thus, as with the politicians, the media fails to fulfil the vital task of forcing Canadians to examine in depth the nature and roots of pressing issues. Moreover, inadvertently, the media also acts as an easily manipulated tool for those political forces determined to encourage complacency or to discredit efforts at dealing with problems. Ironically, the English language media's own sense of news judgment concerning the issue of national unity has reinforced and assisted those politicians in their efforts to minimize public interest in the issue.

And so we see the three closely related causes of our present morass: first, our political parties, which have recognized that an appeal to the baser elements of the Canadian character—the greed, the complacency, the desire for single, painless solutions—is often the safest and most rewarding course; secondly, the media's revelling in its enormous power and influence, yet failing to exercise along with that power the accompanying responsibility to fully inform Canadians of the deep and on-going problems facing the nation; and lastly, the citizens themselves who, while in part the victims of the actions of the first two groups, have also in recent times shown a petulant avariciousness, a decline in idealism and patriotic selflessness, and a distressing unwillingness to even acknowledge the seriousness of our national plight.

Against this grim backdrop, what chance does any government or any leader have when attempting to institute necessary change? More often than not citizens are far from fully concerned about the issue and, even when concerned, tend to resent any solutions requiring any effort or commitment on their part.

The political opponents, of course, will be quick to criticize, to confuse, and to delay as well as to offer to the public the impression that a simpler answer exists. The press, of course, in search of the sensational angle, will cover the criticisms, regardless of how extreme or dishonest they may be while, at the same time, seldom extending their examination of the issue beyond the political theatre. Again, I quote Solzhenitsyn, the Nobel Prize winner:

In today's western society, a statesman who wants to achieve something important and constructive for his country has to move cautiously and even timidly. There are thousands of hasty and irresponsible critics around him. Parliament and the press keep rebuffing him. As he moves ahead he has to prove that each single step of his is well-founded and absolutely flawless. Actually, an outstanding and particularly gifted person who has unusual and unexpected initiatives in mind hardly gets a chance to assert himself. From the very beginning dozens of traps will be set out for him. Thus, mediocrity triumphs with the excuse of restrictions imposed by democracy.

I have often pondered, with some amazement, the history of the demise of various once vigorous nations and societies, wondering, for instance, how the sensible and educated Germans could have permitted the decadent decline of the twenties Weimar Republic, or the emergence of the Nazi horror in the thirties.

Yet, today, as I watch my own nation drift towards an uncertain future, I have come to understand the insidious impact of the collective loss of courage and will. I have become convinced that our own future will only improve when this nation's citizens and principal institutions display an as yet unapparent resolve to face fully and responsibly the hard choices that must be made. Our citizens must, quite simply, take off the blinkers. Our media must clearly develop a broader concept of the responsibility of the press, one which rejects the existing restrictive concept of news judgment in favour of a system which places greater emphasis on truly educating Canadians about pressing national issues.

On the political front, I feel this Throne Speech contains some encouraging signs of movement in the right direction. Certainly, there are indications of some efforts by the government to respond seriously to our nation's economic and constitutional difficulties. Whether these responses are appropriate or even sincere will only be determined upon the introduction of the various pieces of legislation.

I would urge Canadians to examine the proposals with an open mind and consider whether they are credible solutions to some of this nation's very serious problems.

STRIKE OF ENGINEERS AND DECK OFFICERS

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the next speaker proceeds, I should like to inform the Senate about the situation regarding the Great Lakes shipping strike. I have just received the following information. The meeting which had been scheduled for yesterday did not take place because representatives of a group of employees did not show up. However, since 10 o'clock this morning the representatives of the employees and the employers have been meeting with Mr. Tom Kelly of the Department of Labour, and this meeting is still in progress.

The Senate resumed from earlier this day consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Rizzuto, seconded by Senator Bird, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have had the honour of being a member of this chamber now for several months, but this is the first time I have had an opportunity to speak in the Throne Speech debate when members are given an opportunity to cover a wide range of matters concerning not only national issues but also regional issues, and I am grateful for that.

I want to begin, if I may, by offering my gratitude to you, Madam Speaker, for the gracious, efficient, and competent way in which you have handled your responsibilities towards this chamber.

I also want to express my congratulations to the mover and to the seconder of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I feel that both of those speeches expressed a sense of concern and, at the same time, a continuing confidence in Canada, and I cannot help but completely agree with that. Certainly, the statistics and examples that have been brought to the attention of this house, particularly respecting economic matters, can lead only to the conclusion that we do have that confidence in Canada and, indeed, in Canadians.

I would also mention the speech made by Senator Perrault, the Leader of the Government in this chamber. He went through a number of examples, citing chapter and verse, making comparisons between the situation here and in other countries and, indeed, the situation in this era in this country as compared to other eras. If you look at the complete picture objectively, you can reach no other conclusion but that in economic terms Canada is not in the deplorable state that some have depicted.

I am sorry if in the remarks I have to make I paint a slightly different picture of Canada from that of Senator Wagner's, because from the vantage point from which I see Canada, and indeed Canadians participating in Canada's development, I do not see that black picture of morass and insurmountable difficulties.

I now want to say a few words about the things contained in the Speech from the Throne. As we know, it contained many things. There were economic matters, social policy amendments, as well as constitutional and structural amendments.

Let me deal first with constitutional and structural amendments. After the examination we made of Bill C-60 in the last session, I know of no one in this chamber who would not agree that we need a new bill, a very different bill from Bill C-60. I do not want to get into all the details of that.

During the past summer Bill C-60 was the subject of many more conversations with rank-and-file Canadians than I have ever had before. First of all, that is because of the dominance of change in the structure of the Senate, and so on, contained in that bill. I suggest that one thing that came through very clearly was that people who had not previously been concerned about Canada's Constitution at all, people who were neither knowledgeable nor particularly concerned about the Senate, the Supreme Court of Canada or other institutions, such as the monarchy, even though they did not understand all of the legalities, the base on which these institutions are in Canada today, became uneasy. Why? Because they regard these institutions, including the Senate, to be some of the anchors of stability in our whole system, and when somebody starts playing around with those kinds of things people become uneasy, even if they do not understand the detail.

I suggest, therefore, that this must lead to the conclusion that constitutional amendments of the magnitude contained in Bill C-60, involving these institutions upon which our whole system is based, should be undertaken in an evolutionary rather than a revolutionary way. In other words, the evolution of constitutional change should go on all the time, whenever we see the need and when there is agreement that there is a need. But when they came along with a package as big as that contained in Bill C-60, including not only the proposal to patriate—if that is the right word—the Constitution, but so many changes in the fundamental structure of Canada's political system, people became uneasy. In my view, we should not try that again.

That raises an important question, which is how we get pieces of the Constitution out of Westminster into the Canadian statutes. That is a very important question, and I do not think I know the answer, unless and until we come up with some kind of acceptable amending formula. I am sure that the almost revolutionary change proposed—although “revolutionary” is not the right word—created uncertainty about these fundamental institutions, and people do not accept that.

We have some lessons from history. I recall the time when we were going to undertake a complete revision of the taxation system in Canada. It is not my purpose today to try to argue that that whole package was wrong or right, or whatever, but the fact is that it was too much all at once. Yet the commissioner said that his proposals were structured in such a way that you could not do it piecemeal; you had to take the whole package or nothing. In my view, the consequence of that, even in retrospect—and I think many other people hold the same view—was that it created so much uncertainty about what the whole new taxation regime would look like that people backed away from it, and resented it, for that very reason alone. I think it is fair to say that business concerns, which were vitally interested in what the taxation rules were going to be, backed away from it and resented it, and did a number of things that they would not otherwise have done to resist it had the uncertainty created by the proposals not been there.

I want now to say a word or two about some of the social policies contained in the Speech from the Throne. I agree that adjustments in old age security and family allowances should continue to be made, even in times of austerity—if that is the way we are supposed to describe our national government's plans at the moment. These kinds of amendments to and improvements in social policy ought to continue. I think it is fair to say that with the level of prosperity that we have, by and large, across the country today, we do not have the right to abandon, and we ought not even to consider abandoning, those who cannot defend themselves against inflation and other things that are going on in the country.

Turning to economic matters, I want to express agreement with some of the industrial and commercial incentive or stimulative measures that I suggest are, at least prospectively, beneficial to the country. Certainly I agree with a tightening up of some of the programs that would prevent, or at least inhibit, the redistribution of Canada's production to those people who now possess a reasonable share of our economic output. I have no disagreement with that at all.

However, a very serious question is raised in my mind about whether or not having an overall austerity program is the way to stimulate the economy. I know that the reason advanced for some of the austerity measures that have been announced in the last two or three months is that they are for the purpose of trying to create confidence in the minds of men and women in business so that they will be prepared to invest in Canada's future, to invest in new plant and new distribution centres, and thus create jobs.

I do not believe, however, that when the government embarks upon an austerity program it encourages business to invest. That has not been the case in the past. I want to make it abundantly clear that some of the programs that have been causing a lot of money to flow through the Treasury and that have, in some cases, reached the point where they are abused—I do not need to spell them out—should be cooled down a bit. But to withdraw from important and useful public works projects and expect that kind of action to stimulate the Canadian economy is not wise, because things will not turn out that way. There are several examples of this. There is the large power project in Quebec. If it is determined that this project will be needed at some future time to provide more power, I think that at a time when we have high unemployment, and a time when we probably have the labour resources to do the job, we should get on with it. This is a good example of something we should do when there is slack in the economy.

I have a great deal of difficulty in accepting the fact that withdrawal from public works projects will lead to the desired results later. From talking to businessmen at all levels, even some in the higher echelons, I find that there seems to be a contradiction, in that the program does not encourage businessmen to go out and expand investment. So I hope there will be some reconsideration given to whether or not an overall austerity program is desirable.

I realize commitments were made in concert with a number of the other western industrial nations. I do not disagree with our having given those commitments. Canada cannot solve the problem of inflation, which is now threatening to go back into the two-digit figure, alone. Even the United States, as powerful as she is economically, is not going to be able to solve that problem alone. It will be done in concert with a number of nations, or it will not succeed.

We should really have another look at some of the various projects that we could undertake in Canada to take up some of the slack in our economy. It seems that we do not learn the lessons of history very well. I am not blaming this government for that. Other governments have made the same mistake. We can talk about the thirties. It was a chain reaction of contraction not only in Canada but also in most of the world. That is such an outstanding example that we should not have to draw it in any detail. But we had another example from 1961 until 1964 when another political party was in office, and they followed essentially the same pattern of starting to cut out certain types of programs. I think the same mistake was made then. The Canadian economy pulled through then, and I have every confidence the Canadian economy will pull through again. But it will be done as a result of factors other than an austerity program. As a matter of fact, an overall austerity program will delay our achieving an expansion in our economy. At least, that is my view at this time.

We are going to have other problems. Everybody knows what is happening in the labour-management situation today. I do not think anyone need be surprised that we have these labour difficulties since the Anti-Inflation Board's jurisdiction came to an end. The Anti-Inflation Board withdrew some months ago, and it will have pulled out completely by the end of the year. We knew there was this attitude not only on the part of unions but also at management level. Senior executives were just going to wait until the close, and then catch up. From what I hear, there is even an attitude in the higher echelons, the management group, that their expectations of catching up are much higher than the expectations of the labour unions. We are going to face that situation in the next few weeks or months, if it is not already upon us.

When I look at that kind of attitude and the demands that are based on it, I really wonder whether we are facing problems of hardship or, indeed, problems caused by prosperity. When I say that, I am just wondering if it has not become such a habit in Canada to constantly seek a larger piece of the pie rather than to be concerned about increasing the size of the pie, that we have come to the point where there is complete disregard for the total.

Senator Greene: It's pretty crummy.

Senator Olson: It is crummy. I suppose that is one word you can use. I was really trying to search out some solution. If it is a problem of hardship suffered by people who are demanding more and more, I think we can meet that. If their hardship is limited to a lack of creature comforts, such as food, clothing and shelter—

Senator Greene: Pure pie.

Senator Olson: If they are problems arising out of prosperity, where they now have the capability of being adamant without the risk of hardship, then we face a different set of problems which I suggest require different solutions.

What are those solutions? I suppose the obvious one is to reduce the prosperity until there is some hardship. That changes the attitudes of people, but it is a very savage, vicious and inhumane way of going about it. We do have to face the possibility that in some cases it may be the only way by which this attitude can be changed. But I sincerely hope not, honourable senators, because Canada has such a tremendous capability that we are able to produce all the goods and services to not only maintain our present standard of living but to increase it. I am absolutely confident that this will be the case, providing people realize that if they want a bigger share of the pie then there must be a bigger pie to share; they cannot expect a bigger share of what someone else has.

To find solutions to these problems I suppose we will have to go via the trial and error route. Human nature being what it is, I suppose there will be some hardship somewhere along the line—or what appears to be hardship relative to our present standard of living. Demands by some may be so severe that people are going to suffer hardship before they become aware of the fact that there is no other way, that there is no other solution. However, as I said a moment ago, I hope not.

I now wish to deal with one or two other matters, and I promise to keep my remarks fairly brief. First of all, I think we should remind ourselves that Canada has unique problems, unique in that they apply to Canada almost exclusively. I am talking about the financial problems we are experiencing with the devaluation of the Canadian dollar, problems which some people consider great problems. I do not fall into the class of people who think the devaluation of the Canadian dollar in relation to the United States dollar is a problem.

When I say these problems are unique, I mean they are unique because of the size of our involvement with the United States, and, in particular, the size of our involvement in financial matters with the United States. In this respect, I am talking about the money market, and the size of our trade both in absolute terms and as a percentage of our total trade. These problems are different for Canada—much more different for Canada—from what they are for other countries. We must address ourselves specifically to that and try to find solutions that are different from those used by other countries, and, indeed, historic solutions at that. For example, our economic intercourse with the United States and her financial markets are such that we have set up certain patterns—that is, we have allowed a great deal of foreign investment into Canada. We appreciated that when it came because it expanded our economic base and provided much needed jobs. However, I think we forgot, at least partly forgot, that we have to pay for that both in terms of interest and dividends. These patterns developed because there was sufficient new investment coming into Canada all the time and that took care of our deficits, and the dollar remained strong as far as the supply and demand of international exchange was concerned.

Since then two or three things have occurred. The savings levels of Canadians have gone up so much lately that it is now unnecessary for certain corporations—corporations which traditionally made massive borrowings from the United States—to borrow from the United States. I am thinking of massive borrowings such as those made by the provincial governments, and large corporations such as Hydro Quebec and Ontario Hydro, when they borrowed at the levels of the past. Indeed, the pattern goes all across the country. Recent borrowing has not been at the level it was in the past.

The traditional borrowing pattern is going out of balance. It is not improper for the Minister of Finance to borrow outside the country, particularly in the United States, when some of the other traditional borrowing has slowed down. Some people think that this is done at a tremendous cost to the Canadian treasury, but I suggest it is not, and that it is indeed appropriate. Whenever there are great shifts in the traditional movement of money, problems arise. I do not have the same concern that many have expressed as a result of the choice of the Minister of Finance to add some foreign exchange to our holdings by borrowing from the United States. For example, if one major hydro corporation had borrowed half a billion dollars from the United States, that would have had just as much effect on the supply-demand ratio as the borrowing of the same amount by the Minister of Finance.

I believe we should take these things into account. I also believe that we should stop highlighting some of our diversity. I realize that I am at variance with the previous speaker on this, but I do not think all this highlighting of matters of diversity that has occupied centre stage for the past few years has helped much. I do not think it has brought a greater measure of unity. I am not even sure that it has brought us closer to finding an acceptable solution, but it might have. I am sure it has done some damage to our overall economic performance, and I am also certain that many people—at least those living in the part of Canada I come from—believe that we should have spent a little more time on economic matters and a little less time highlighting these diversities. I do not think we should ignore them. I think we should continue to recognize that these divisions are there, and that we should make further progress towards overcoming them, but they should not occupy centre stage any longer. We should give these matters less attention today.

I think we should be positive. There is a great amount of sound economic activity going on in Canada, and there is the potential for much more, and we should start talking it up more and more. We should be proud of Canada and what it has achieved.

I have travelled somewhat extensively around the world. When one travels, one inevitably makes comparisons, and I can say that I am always much more appreciative of Canada as a result of such comparisons. There are some nations which have a material standard of living that is comparable or nearly comparable to that of Canada, but when one includes all things which go into a satisfactory standard of living—such things as public institutions, the political structure, and so forth—Canada comes out best.

[Senator Olson.]

I should like to conclude with some remarks respecting Bill C-60 of the last session. It seems to me that there is a message for honourable senators in Bill C-60 and that is, if there is one criticism of this chamber it is that we have not fulfilled our obligation to look after the regional interests. I do not know how many of my colleagues share that point of view. I endeavour to take care of the interests of the region or part of Canada I come from. Also, I am constantly reminded that one of the main purposes in setting up the Senate in the first instance was to provide representation for regional interests at the federal level.

I think we should meet that criticism. It would probably mean spending quite a bit more time in considering bills which have a significant regional impact. But I also think that we have to temper it, at least slightly. It would be very easy to dig one's heels in on a regional basis and be adamant to the point of frustrating national purposes. In addition to being responsible for putting forward the regional points of view, we have a responsibility to look at the overall national scene. The two interests have to be balanced, but perhaps we could swing a little more toward the regional aspect, which would mean many more hours both in the house and in committee work.

Honourable senators, that is the message I got from Bill C-60, and I think we should try to meet that criticism even before a new bill is introduced.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I am pleased to associate myself with the pleasant custom of offering congratulations at the beginning of one's remarks in the Throne Speech debate.

I offer my congratulations to you, Madam Speaker, for the pleasant way in which you preside over our deliberations in this chamber, and for the excellent way in which you perform your other duties on behalf of the Senate outside this chamber.

Both the mover and seconder of the motion for an Address in reply made very interesting speeches, and I congratulate them, as I congratulate all of those who have preceded me in this debate.

I had intended to make some remarks about constitutional matters, but, frankly, I am so satisfied with the position adopted by Senator Bird in her remarks seconding the motion that I think it not necessary for me to say anything more, other than to acknowledge that she said very well those things that I myself would have said had I addressed myself to that subject. There is no need to put the same views on the record more than once.

I want to speak, relatively briefly, on three matters today. The first of them has to do with the question of labour relations and strikes in the public service and in the great essential services, including transportation and communications, and the great utilities such as those which generate and distribute electricity. It is trite to point out that the situation in the 1970s is a very different one from that which obtained when the technique of strikes was developed during the last century in the industrial countries of the world. Our society has become vastly more complicated. We have all become more dependent upon one another, and we have all become far more dependent upon public utilities, communications, transportation, and so forth.

Frankly, I now think, after having given a good deal of thought to the subject, that we made a mistake when we gave the right to strike to members of the public service. I think we should reassess our position in relation to that. True, it was always said that public servants, before they were given the right to strike, were not paid as well as people in the private sector. As against that, they had job security and generous pension allowances. Today, of course, the level of their salaries has caught up with and, in many cases, exceeded their opposite members in private industry, and the pension arrangements throughout our society have become, if not universal, inclusive of a very large proportion of our population. I think it ought to be a condition of employment in the public service, as well as in some of these other essential services, that there should not be the right to strike.

Yesterday, for the eighth time in as many years, according to Senator Asselin, we passed special legislation taking away the right to strike as soon as the weapon was resorted to by the workers. I think we should anticipate this in the future, and we should provide binding or compulsory arbitration, or some other technique, and do away with strikes in the public service and in the great essential services and utilities.

I know that this proposal will be regarded by some as highly reactionary on my part, but I make it because I do not want to see the ascendancy of reactionary forms. Indeed, I make it because I think it may prevent a reaction which would be too extreme. History has shown that in times of disorder and chaos men have continually chosen order and security at the expense of individual and political liberty. I am afraid, if the representative parliamentary democratic process, which we all believe in and value so highly in this country, cannot keep the institutions of our society operating smoothly, including the relationship between management and labour, that even in a country like Canada people may choose an authoritarian government which will ensure order at the expense of liberty.

That may seem a remote possibility to Canadians, but there has already been reference made in today's debate to the same sort of thing happening in the enlightened countries of Italy, in supporting Mussolini, and Germany, in supporting Hitler, within the lifetime and recollection of many of us here. So, I do not make this proposal because I want to be more reactionary. I make it because I think that by solving this problem now, and giving the working people who are concerned alternative measures to ensure that they are treated fairly, paid reasonably and have reasonable working conditions, and so forth, and by doing so under our free society, we may prevent a more reactionary move—a move which, I am sure, none of us would approve of.

Now, quite apart from whether we will in the near future, or at any time in the future, adopt the suggestion that I have made, I want to say that from a local point of view the recent strike of Air Canada pointed out the extreme isolation experienced by a province like Nova Scotia when Air Canada goes on strike. And whether or not we stop strikes in the public service, including the great transportation utilities like Air Canada, I think there should no longer be any delay in the granting of an alternate franchise for some other national carrier to fly into Halifax.

I understand that there is an application on behalf of Canadian Pacific Airlines at present being considered. In my view it should be granted forthwith. In addition to that, I believe that some other carrier should be allowed to fly from Nova Scotia into Boston and New York or, failing that, we should give a franchise to an American airline to fly into Halifax and perhaps some other centres in the Atlantic provinces. We ought not to be left dependent only on the services of one carrier when the consequences can be so difficult in the kind of world in which we live today.

I have only one other subject I want to comment on, and that has to do with the restraints program of the government. I think that people generally recognize the necessity for these restraints, and generally support the government in implementing them. I certainly recognize that this means that there have to be difficult decisions made, and that there are always going to be people who will be disappointed when projects in which they are particularly interested are curtailed, slowed down or delayed. But I do think it is very shortsighted in a country like Canada to curtail expenditures in those areas that are important to the productive capacity of the country, and to the exploitation of our natural resources. I have an example to illustrate the point I am making.

It is suspected that the fisheries research establishment in Halifax is going to be closed down or phased out of existence. Surely this does not make good sense at a time when Canada is trying to exert control over a much larger coastal zone—the 200-mile fishing zone—and when the reputation of this laboratory and its contribution to fishing techniques, the processing of fish foods, and so on, has been so great. I have had a number of letters written to me about this, and I should like to quote a paragraph from one scientist who writes:

It should also be pointed out that the scientific community as a whole will suffer by the closure. The laboratory here in Halifax has an international reputation as a result of its ongoing and outstanding research programs. There exists therefore a group of scientists who are working efficiently with modern methods and equipment to keep in the forefront of research. It seems utterly unthinkable that such a group would be split up and diversified when Canada already has far too few groups of this calibre.

And he also says that the library at this institution “has an excellent collection of marine and food related journals which are not available . . . elsewhere in the Halifax-Dartmouth area.” These journals are often consulted, of course, by many persons who are not members of the Fisheries Research Board.

Another scientist wrote to me—and I would point out that neither of these is employed by the Fisheries Research Board—and said:

The work of the Halifax laboratory involves pure and applied biochemistry of fish and fish products, food processing technology, the development of fishing equipment and advice to industry. Referring to the biological and biochemical side of its work, . . . the point should be made that although the laboratory is a relatively small one by Federal standards its staff is a highly competent and internationally recognized one. In particular—

And then he names four scientists.

—are highly respected on the international scientific scene. To break up a group of this quality, whose work is important locally, nationally and internationally, is equivalent to vandalism.

That is what my correspondent says. Well, I do not know if the situation is as bad as that or not, but I think this is an example of trying to save a relatively small amount of money in an area where we may cut off research that will affect the productive capacity and the gross national product of the entire country.

Those, honourable senators, are the only points I wanted to make this afternoon. I thank you for the attention that you have given to me.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Walker, debate adjourned.

POST OFFICE GREAT LAKES SHIPPING

LABOUR DISPUTES—MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Senator Langlois: Before moving the adjournment of the Senate, I should like to inform honourable senators of a statement made in the other place this afternoon by the Honourable the Postmaster General. He said that those CUPW leaders who feel that they will not be prosecuted are very much mistaken. They should be aware that the full force of the law will be applied. Post Office workers will be protected from those who would intimidate them. Later, he added that there will be no lockout. Those who turn up for work will be allowed to work.

With respect to the shipping strike, I am informed that the meeting of the employers and employees on strike with officials of the Department of Labour is still in progress.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 24, at 8 p.m.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

WEDNESDAY, October 18, 1978

The Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution has the honour to present its First Report as follows:—

I—GENERAL

INTRODUCTION

1. The Committee

One June 20, 1978, Bill C-60 entitled "An Act to amend the Constitution of Canada with respect to matters coming within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, and to approve and authorize the taking of measures necessary for the amendment of the Constitution with respect to certain other matters" was given first reading in the House of Commons. At the same time, the Government stated that its target date for enactment of the Bill was July 1979. In accordance with the practice of the Senate to refer to committee the subject matter of important bills introduced in the House of Commons in advance of their coming to the Senate to allow time for careful study, and so that the Government and the House of Commons have the benefit of recommendations of the Senate before such bills are adopted by the House of Commons, the Senate on June 28th authorized the appointment of a special committee to consider and report upon the subject matter of Bill C-60.

The committee, which was known as the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution, was duly appointed and commenced its consideration of the Bill on July 25th. Prior to the end of the last Session of Parliament, it had held thirty-six sittings for the purpose of hearing witnesses (see list attached as Appendix "A") and study and consideration of the Bill. Preparation of a report was in the final stages but it was impossible to complete it in time for tabling before the Session ended on October 10th. The committee therefore reported accordingly and recommended that it be reconstituted for the purpose of completing the report. The present committee was appointed by the Senate on October 11 for that purpose and to continue its study of constitutional matters.

2. Nature of the present report

Although as indicated above the committee has held a number of sittings over a period of approximately two and a half months, it does not consider that there has been sufficient time either to hear all of the evidence that is required on the proposals contained in Bill C-60 or to reach final conclusions on all aspects of the Bill. The proposals are novel and far reaching and deserve serious and unhurried study. Nevertheless, because of statements that the Bill would not be reintroduced in its original form and that drafting of a new bill would likely be put in hand soon, your committee considers it important to record without delay the views based on the study that it has been able to give to the proposals so far, so that they will be available for consideration in discussions leading to a revised bill.

Your committee heard expert evidence on the proposals in general as well as on particular subjects. In addition, it had several sessions with the draftsmen of the Bill.

While your committee is not in a position to comment on all of the provisions, the queries raised during its hearings are on the record and will be available to those involved in the continuing process of constitutional reform. In this connection, your committee commends to those interested the excellent summary of evidence and discussion prepared by the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament, copies of which are available.

THE "PROCESS" OF CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

The British North America Act may be 110 years old and some of its language quaint, but it is a document that has, in the main, served Canadians well and proved to be enormously flexible. Drastic changes to it should not be made in haste.

There has been great difficulty over the years in accomplishing comprehensive constitutional change and your committee wishes to commend the Government for taking the step of putting proposals in legislative form. This, together with the original speedy timetable for adoption has focused the concentrated attention of Canadians on constitutional questions.

Essential parties to any form of wide-ranging constitutional reform are the provincial governments. Their negative reaction to Bill C-60 is well known. It was expressed first in August at the Conference of Provincial Premiers in Regina and again in Montreal in September at the meeting of provincial ministers responsible for constitutional matters.

The Premiers complained about the amount of prior consultation, the announced intention of proceeding unilaterally in certain areas and the fact that proposals on the distribution of legislative powers were not available for simultaneous discussion.

Following a challenge, by expert witnesses, of the claimed legal right of Parliament to proceed unilaterally on the proposals regarding the Monarchy and the House of the Federation, the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution adopted a resolution recommending that the question be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for decision. Shortly afterwards, the Minister of Justice announced that the question insofar as it concerned the House of the Federation would be so referred.

The reference to the Supreme Court will settle the legal question so that any amendments ultimately agreed upon can be made in the certainty that the proper procedure has been followed. However, whatever the Court may say about the necessity or degree of provincial agreement that must precede such amendments, your committee hopes that they, as well as other proposals, will be made in close consultation with the provincial governments.

Your committee expects that these events, the forthcoming federal-provincial constitutional conference and the report on the Task Force on Canadian Unity will have the effect of slowing down the timetable originally proposed and of bringing the discussion of all factors into much closer proximity.

While the advisability of attempts at comprehensive constitutional reform has been questioned (see for example Dr. J. A. Corey, "Uses of a Constitution", Law Society of Upper Canada Special Lectures on the Constitution (1978), particularly at pages 3, 13 and 15), if we are to embark on such an attempt, it is the committee's view that all of the proposals should be laid before those whose decision is required.

AN AMENDING FORMULA

A fundamental question in constitutional reform is the development of a suitable amending formula for those important areas, including sections 91 and 92 of the B.N.A. Act, that can now only be amended by an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. Reaching agreement on such a formula is essential to "patriation" of the Constitution.

It is also important in the face of the many proposals in the Bill to "entrench" certain provisions. The nature of the amending formula will have a bearing on the question of whether or not it is desirable to place a given provision in the entrenched category. If the formula is too strict, some provisions may be better left unentrenched.

The proposal regarding the House of the Federation also illustrates the importance of the question of entrenchment. One of the legal issues as to Parliament's right to enact the proposal unilaterally turns on the question of whether the proposal to substitute a House of the Federation for the Senate affects rights or privileges granted or secured to the legislature or the government of a province within the meaning of head 1 of section 91 of the B.N.A. Act. For even if the Supreme Court should decide that enactment of the proposals does not affect such rights or privileges and that Parliament is competent to enact them, the proposals themselves, by giving to the provincial legislatures the right to select members of the House of the Federation, appear to secure such rights. Thus, while Parliament might be competent to enact the proposals initially, it might be incapable of amending them in the future.

Bill C-60 contains no proposals on an amending formula, although the Government subsequently issued a paper entitled "The Canadian Constitution and Constitutional Amendment", which reviews the history of the search for an amending formula in Canada and sets out various possibilities.

Your committee considers that high priority should be given to reaching agreement with the provinces on an amending formula as part of the continued discussions on the substance of constitutional reform.

II—SPECIFIC OBSERVATIONS ON BILL C-60

DRAFTING STYLE

The drafting of Bill C-60 in your committee's opinion leaves much to be desired in many cases. The style of presentation is very similar to that of ordinary federal statutes dealing with technical or complex subjects. While an arrangement consisting of elephantine sections with numerous subsections and paragraphs may be suited to such statutes (not all would even agree on this) your committee suggests that some other approach should be used when it comes to constitutions. Someone has said that the Bill reads like a lease, others have said that it reads like the Income Tax Act. Surely neither is a model of inspiring literary excellence. A constitution should be an enduring historical document, capable, so far as possible, of easy understanding by the layman and by students. If the language of the B.N.A. Act is, as the Government paper "A Time for Action" suggests, "obscure" and "the style plodding and uninspiring", the Bill is little improvement.

STATEMENT OF AIMS

Your committee considers it desirable to include a Statement of Aims in the Constitution. They should be more tersely expressed however and arranged in a more easily readable manner. Clause 3 alone, for example, is a sentence of seventeen lines and many of the stated aims set out in clause 4 are nearly as long.

CHARTER OF HUMAN RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

1. Present Provisions

The present Bill of Rights is an ordinary statute of Parliament that could be repealed or amended by Parliament at any time. While the Bill of Rights contains provisions indicating that it is to apply even to subsequent statutes that conflict with it, the courts have been hesitant to apply it. The Bill of Rights applies, of course, only to federal legislation, although some provinces have enacted their own Bill of Rights.

2. Bill C-60 Provisions

Bill C-60 would incorporate the substance of the present Bill of Rights in the Constitution. It would add additional rights, some of which are taken from existing provisions of the B.N.A. Act and other statutes, dealing with the inter-provincial mobility of citizens, the duration of elected legislative bodies and language and schooling rights.

The Charter would apply to all federal legislation from the date of coming into force of the Bill (subclause 131(1)). In its provincial dimensions, however, it would apply only to those provinces that decided to "opt in". The incentive for each province to do so is that the Federal power of disallowance of provincial legislation would be dropped when any province "opts in". Apparently, however, a province could opt out later and presumably the power of disallowance would then revive. While there is provision for eventual entrenchment of the Charter (subclause 131(2)), the effect and meaning of this obviously cannot be understood until an amending formula is devised, with provision as to how it will operate in relation to amendments to the Charter.

3. Evidence

Of the distinguished witnesses on the subject of human rights that your committee has heard to date, none appeared critical of the actual inventory of rights and freedoms proposed, although your committee points out that it has not had time to hear sufficient evidence with respect to the proposed inter-provincial mobility rights and the language and schooling rights.

On the general question of the enforceability of the Charter, one witness was opposed to entrenchment on the grounds that it tends to give too much legislative authority to the Courts and would hamper the ability of the people to reflect changing values in society through legislative action.

Another witness, although not opposed to entrenchment, felt that it would add little to the enforceability of a constitutionalized Bill of Rights that clearly expressed the intention that it was to override other legislation. He was also concerned that the proposed wording of the Charter would permit continuation of the "frozen concepts" theory in establishing rights and freedoms. Finally, he was concerned that some of the rights and freedoms granted might be rendered illusory by the absence of adequate remedies and, particularly, of an exclusionary rule in regard to administrative acts and evidence obtained in contravention of the Charter.

4. Observations

Your committee agrees with the proposal to place the Bill of Rights in the Constitution.

Notwithstanding the cogent arguments that exist to the contrary, your committee considers that, in principle, entrenchment of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms applicable to both the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures would be desirable. It refers, however, to its earlier observations about the relationship of entrenchment to a suitable amending formula and the difficulty of recommending entrenchment without knowing how the formula would operate.

Your committee refers to the Summary of Evidence prepared by the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament mentioned earlier in this report and the Proceedings of the Committee, Issue No. 4, August 10, 1978 as to suggestions for improvement in the wording of certain sections.

THE MONARCHY, GOVERNOR GENERAL AND CABINET

Your committee considers that some of the fears expressed on the subject of the provisions relating to the monarchy, the Governor General and the Cabinet have exaggerated the extent of the changes proposed in the Bill. At the same time, it considers that the Government's avowed objective of stating the actual practice of constitutional monarchy in contemporary terms would, insofar as the role of the Queen is concerned be better achieved by

(a) referring to the Queen simply as the "sovereign" of Canada (as in the French text of clause 30) rather than the "sovereign head" of Canada;

(b) declaring, in clause 43, that the executive government of and over Canada shall be vested in the Queen to be exercised by Her Majesty personally or by the Governor General of Canada; and

(c) retaining the Queen as part of Parliament.

With respect to the appointment of the Governor General, your committee is of the view that some consideration should be given to the inclusion in the Constitution of a provision relating to the security of tenure of the person occupying the position of Governor General.

Your committee considers that section 55 of the B.N.A. Act should be modernized by removing the provision for withholding assent or reserving bills for the Queen's pleasure as this provision is clearly obsolete.

Your committee also questions whether clause 47 vesting the commander-in-chief of the Canadian Forces in the Governor General is really necessary, as clearly the Forces are subject to the control of the Government and Parliament.

If the change recommended in paragraph (b) above is made, that part of subclause 48 (2) that purports to preserve the powers of the Sovereign while in Canada, could be deleted as unnecessary.

Your committee sees no reason for changing the name of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada to the Council of State of Canada.

Your committee agrees that there should be explicit provision for the Cabinet, but suggests that it be described as consisting of the Prime Minister and such other privy councillors as are ministers of the Crown and are invited to be members of the Cabinet by the Prime Minister. The Cabinet should also be described as the principal instrument of policy, charged with the general management and direction of the Government of Canada and collectively responsible to the House of Commons. This should not, however, prevent individual ministers from answering for their respective departments. Your committee agrees that no person should be eligible to be a member of the Cabinet unless that person is a member of one of the Houses of Parliament or is qualified to be a candidate for election to the House of Commons. However, your committee is of the view that a member of the Cabinet, or a minister, who for any period of six consecutive months is not a member of one of the Houses of Parliament should, at the expiration of that period, cease to be a member of the Cabinet or a minister.

Your committee does not believe that a Prime Minister who has lost the confidence of the House of Commons should have the right, let alone the duty (as proposed in clause 53(2)(b)) of advising the Crown or its representative whether he, the defeated Prime Minister, should be invited to form a new Government. This would be not a restatement of, but a marked departure from, the existing convention (under which a Prime Minister who resigns, for any reason, has no right to proffer any advice whatever as to his successor, unless the Crown or its representative asks him to do so, and even then the advice need not be taken).

Your committee finds the provisions of clause 51 obscure. If they are intended to provide for the appointment of Ministers of the Crown who are not to be members of the Cabinet, they should say so clearly. But the committee's proposals on the constitution of the Cabinet (that it should consist of those Ministers invited to it by the Prime Minister) would remove the necessity for any such clause, if indeed its purpose is simply to provide for a two-tier Ministry, as in Britain.

Your committee considers that any attempt to put the conventions, customs and usages of the Constitution into a text of law should for various reasons be approached with the utmost caution.

For example, except for a very few simple matters, like the responsibility of the Cabinet to the House of Commons, it would be very hard to do. For one thing, there is often some uncertainty, even among constitutional writers of repute, as to precisely what they are. As long as they are left uncoded, this problem can be dealt with by the political process itself: the House of Commons and the electorate can decide what a particular usage, custom or convention is.

Your committee agrees that the written Constitution should make it plain that its text is not the whole of what Sir Leonard Courtney called "the working Constitution"; that conventions, customs and usages play an enormous part in the way we are actually governed. This might be done by providing that the constitutional conventions, customs and usages in existence in Canada immediately prior to the coming into force of a new Constitution would not, unless therein provided, be affected or rendered enforceable by the court.

THE SECOND CHAMBER

Bill C-60 proposes that the present Senate be replaced by a second chamber composed of people selected by the parties in the provincial legislatures and by the parties in the House of Commons, with terms coinciding with those of the respective elected bodies, power reduced to a 60 day suspensive veto and jurisdiction extended to include approval of certain appointments and a special role in matters of linguistic significance.

Senators welcome the opportunity, provided by the government through Bill C-60, to debate reform of the Senate. It is a process in which they and others have engaged. They were a party to the report of the Joint Committee on the Constitution in 1972. But it was not competent for the Senate to implement those findings and the government did not do so.

This report will not discuss specific alternative proposals for the composition, role and veto power of a second chamber in Canada. Reform is required. Senators would promote it and would be anxious to assist in the process. But the constraints on the time available to your committee have prevented it from undertaking such a study in time for this report. The committee, having been reconstituted by the Senate, intends to do so in the coming months.

It is, however, appropriate to discuss here the fundamental aspects of a Second Chamber.

Any proposal to deal with the structure and function of a Second Chamber in a federal parliamentary system must take account of certain basic principles. It is the basic flaw of Bill C-60 that it uses the single test of regional representation. Any such proposal should decide whether the chamber should be elective or appointive. It should consider its role in a system of checks and balances including a check on the executive. It should consider the importance of revision of legislation. It should assess the value of using the chamber to articulate regional interests and the interests of minority groups without frustrating the parliamentary process. It should evaluate its role in the investigation of and report upon issues of great national concern.

It is proposed to assess the provisions of Bill C-60 for a Second Chamber against these principles.

First, should the chamber be elected or appointed?

Granted, it is anomalous in a democratic age, that a Second Chamber in the parliamentary system should not be responsible to an electorate. But there are cogent reasons why it is so in our system.

They arise mainly from the fact that in the Commons of a parliament is the power of the purse. To the Commons alone is the executive responsible. A directly elected Upper Chamber would claim equal authority with the Commons. This is so within the Congressional (Presidential) system. It is less appropriate in the parliamentary system, and if the parliamentary system is to continue in Canada, the Commons would not have it other than it now is. In theory many Canadians might applaud a move to make the Upper Chamber directly elective. One must be realistic, however; the House of Commons would not tolerate such a change.

Appointment to office is not foreign to our public institutions. The method is used with good results for the judiciary, for the Public Service, for crown corporations, and, after election, for the Cabinet. But when it comes to appointments to the Senate, they are criticised as being favours conferred by the party in office upon the faithful. Bill C-60 does not answer this criticism and actually diffuses responsibility for the appointments.

Secondly, how would the proposed House of the Federation function as the main element in a system of checks and balances including a check on the executive?

Lord Campion, a noted authority and writer on the British parliamentary system, comments upon these principles and in respect of the Parliament of the United Kingdom notes:

"... the development of party machinery, the growing stringency of party discipline... have... worked... to increase the ascendancy of the Executive over Parliament. The Government has also been the chief beneficiary from the restriction of the legislative power of the House of Lords. There has been a deterioration in the position of the House of Commons, as a body, and in the status of individual members."

In Canada, too, Cabinet acts as one; the party acts as one; this is the system. For this reason parliaments in the great democracies of the Western World devised and use the bicameral system.

Should the House of the Federation, as projected in Bill C-60, reject or delay or amend legislation in a manner unacceptable to government policy, the bill in question could be presented for Royal Assent within months, without its concurrence and in most cases without reconsideration by the Commons. In this way, the will of the executive, exercised through its whips, would prevail regardless of the views held in the second chamber. The committee feels that Canadians would not want to vest such absolute power in the Executive. The very existence of a second chamber with meaningful veto or suspensive power is a brake on autocratic behaviour by government.

There must be a balance, however, between curbing autocratic government and ensuring to the federal authority the clear power to deal decisively with national issues and national emergencies. A House made up of members owing allegiance to so many political leaders and characterized by fragmentation of political opinion could well be an obstructive force in the legislative process, even within the time allowed by the proposed limited power to delay passage of legislation.

Thirdly, how would the House of the Federation perform as a body to revise legislation?

Today, the need for study and revision of the ever increasing volume of legislation, the requirement that judgment must bear upon hastily conceived programmes in the social, economic and political life of the nation, the importance of dealing with new complexities of private and public life—such requirements call for some legislative court of appeal, devise it how you will.

The bureaucracy prepares programmes for the Ministers. In turn, the executive through the caucus and the whips apply their pressures to the Commons. The opposition debate, deplore and decry. But after the division bells have rung, the majority group, by which the executive lives, has its way. There is little time or motivation for revision there. But revision is essential.

The work of revision involves lengthy hearings, submissions from informed witnesses, careful cross-examination and the drafting of appropriate amendments. Competence in this work takes much time, effort and dedication. Members of a chamber concerned mainly with partisan political interests, and having an uncertain and brief tenure, are not likely to have the opportunity or motivation required. But in the public interest this work must be done in Parliament as a check on the bureaucracy and the executive and as a supplement to the procedures in the Commons.

The maximum tenure (subject to reappointment) for the members of the House of the Federation, would be the same as the life of the Parliament or of the Legislatures by which they were appointed. The proposed method of selection would make of the chamber a house of minority groups representing political parties and pursuing the purposes of those parties.

On the basis of the last federal and provincial elections held before July 1, 1978, the formula in Bill C-60 would produce the following groups in the House of the Federation:—

HOUSE OF FEDERATION

Distribution of seats among political parties, based on the popular vote in the most recent elections

	Total Seats	Selected by House of Commons (except for Yukon and N.W.T.)				Selected by provincial legislatures

(From "The House of the Federation", a paper issued by the Government of Canada in August 1978)

A body so constituted is not designed to perform the revising function of a second chamber. The interest of members and the thrust of their activities would be in a different direction.

Fourthly, how would the House of the Federation more effectively articulate regional interests and the interest of minority groups without frustrating the parliamentary process?

It should be remembered that existing parliamentary institutions are not without extensive facilities for the expression of regional views. No one should think that members of the Commons confine their interests to the interests of their constituencies. They are much more the spokesmen for provinces and regions.

Cabinet Ministers are usually selected on a regional basis. In the Cabinet they are expected to speak for their areas and provinces in all matters where the concerns of such areas are involved. This has always been a fact of life in Canadian politics.

The caucuses of the federal parties are organized on a regional as well as a national basis. Discussions in regional caucuses are largely regional in character and their concerns are brought to the national caucus.

The B.N.A. Act provides for the appointment of Senators on a regional basis. In the debates, in the committees, and in the special inquiries and reports of the Senate significant attention has been given to regional problems. However, your committee welcomes the proposals of the Bill to allocate fourteen additional seats in the second chamber, twelve of which will go to the provinces in Western Canada. The development in the provinces affected justifies this proposal in any second chamber.

The structure of the House of the Federation, according to the government's paper "A Time for Action", is "to provide Canada's regions with more effective representation in the national legislative process" and to establish

"an effective forum for the expression and protection of regional and provincial interests and concerns."

It is clear in Bill C-60 and in the Table shown above, that the provincial representatives would not control the House. Nor is there any assurance, given the diverse political alignments within and between provincial legislatures, that united effective action could be assured either in respect of regional or of provincial interests.

Provincial appointments would be made anew after each provincial election. Historically the calls of these elections are staggered. Thus there can be no assurance of continuity of provincial representation let alone regional representation. The result would be continuing uncertainty and instability surrounding proposals to promote provincial objectives.

It should be clear also that first ministers and other ministers in the provinces would not surrender to the provincial members of the House of the Federation the right to determine provincial aspirations and policies. Even a united stand by the provincial representatives against a federal legislative proposal would not assure control of the House. And further, even if some federal appointees should vote with them against the proposal in question, the federal government could have its way in sixty days without further reference to the Commons.

It can be understood why, at their meeting in Regina, the First Ministers of the Provinces did not approve the proposals for the House of the Federation. Indeed, solutions to regional complaints will not be found in any proposals to restructure a second chamber. They will emerge from programmes and policies of both federal and provincial governments and from private economic and social initiatives. They can be recognized and projected in the hard realities of bargaining, compromise and agreement at the table of the Federal-Provincial Conference. Canadian governments, federal and provincial, as well as the people of Canada have proved themselves equal to this task in the past. There is no reason to assume that such challenges cannot be met again. Your committee detects an underlying confusion in the minds of the proponents of Bill C-60 between a federal-provincial conclave and a parliamentary second chamber.

Fifthly, Could the House of the Federation carry out an investigative role effectively in matters of national concern?

Your committee has come to the conclusion that the limited tenure of the members of such a House, its highly partisan structure (emphasized by the introduction of a limited system of proportional representation) and the subservient role imposed on it, would render it ineffective in carrying out this important function.

REGIONAL DISPARITIES

Your committee agrees that, in principle, the reduction of regional disparities is a matter that should be dealt with in the Constitution. The references in the Bill are in clause 96 and in the Statement of Aims. It is noted, however, that the operative clause does not give clear expression to the question of ability to pay and does not create any enforceable obligation to assure, as nearly as is practicable, that each province is able to supply to its people a national average level of public services without a greater burden of taxation than the national average.

The matter of making this commitment enforceable is obviously a difficult one and your committee recommends that it be given further consideration by an appropriate Senate committee.

THE SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

1. Present provisions

The B.N.A. Act (s. 101) simply provides that Parliament may establish a general court of appeal for Canada. Pursuant to this power, Parliament established the Supreme Court in 1875. The present Supreme Court Act provides that the Court shall consist of nine judges (the number having been increased from seven to nine in 1949 on abolition of appeals to His Majesty in Council). The Act also provides for the appointment of the Registrar and other officers, for the sessions and quorum of the Court, for its jurisdiction, for the procedure in appeals and for a number of other related and administrative matters.

The Act merely stipulates that the judges must be appointed from among the members of the bench or the provincial Bars by the Governor in Council and does not deal in any way with the process of selection. The only regional requirement is in section 6 which states that at least three of the judges shall come from Quebec.

2. Proposed provisions

Bill C-60 would incorporate in the Constitution, rather than a mere statute, provisions establishing the Court, stipulating the number of judges (which would be increased from the present nine to eleven) and requiring that they be appointed from the regions of Canada, including Quebec. Parliament would continue to provide by ordinary statute for the organization and maintenance of the Court.

The proposed new constitutional provisions would also include features not heretofore dealt with in the Supreme Court Act or any other legislation setting out in considerable detail the procedure for the selection of judges of the Supreme Court. The consent of the Attorney-General of the prospective appointee's province would have to be secured, or where agreement could not be reached, a nominating council would be constituted. Ultimately, the appointment would have to be approved by the proposed House of the Federation.

Finally, the Bill proposes to place in the Constitution a requirement that all civil law questions be decided exclusively by a majority of the judges of the Court appointed from Quebec.

In addition to putting these provisions into the Constitution, the Bill proposes that they be "entrenched" (see clause 133). Parliament, even after entrenchment, would of course still be free to deal unilaterally with matters of organization and maintenance of the Court by ordinary statute.

3. Evidence

The evidence on these proposals that your committee has heard to date is somewhat conflicting, although in the end no witness favoured the ratification of appointments by the House of the Federation. Unfortunately time did not permit, before completion of the present report, the hearing of all the witnesses that your committee originally hoped to hear. Nevertheless, your committee considers that it should set forth its views on the subject based on the evidence already heard.

4. Observations

Your committee sees merit in expanding in the Constitution the very rudimentary provisions now contained in the B.N.A. Act. The Constitution should actually establish the Court, provide for the number of judges, for their qualifications, and for their selection on a regional basis. The Supreme Court of Canada is the final Court of Appeal for constitutional matters and for the interpretation of both federal and provincial laws arising in cases coming from federal and provincial courts. For this reason, your committee thinks there is merit, in principle, in entrenching such provisions in the Constitution. However, it is reluctant to make a final recommendation in this regard in the absence of a constitutional amending formula.

Your committee thinks that the number of judges of the Court should remain at nine. The present practice of the Court is to sit as a full bench in all important matters, particularly constitutional matters. There is evidence that a larger number in cases where the judges were inclined to write separate opinions, would make it difficult to ascertain the ratio decidendi of the judgment. Although fewer than the full court could be assigned to any particular constitutional case, this would involve the Chief Justice in making a selection from among his colleagues that could be criticized to the detriment of the Court's credibility.

Many have advanced the view that the proposed basis of regional appointment of judges would politicize the Court and that the only consideration should be the professional competence of the appointee. It is also argued that feelings of regional alienation and the perception that the Court is dominated by the central authority would be alleviated by constitutional guarantees providing for regional representation. In view of the present unwritten practice of making such appointments as much as possible on a regional basis, your committee considers that the risk of constitutionalizing the practice may not be as great as has been feared.

Your committee, however, would substitute for the consent of the provincial attorney general or the recommendation of a nominating council (subclause 106(3)) a provision requiring consultation, not only with the attorney general in the province of the prospective appointee, but as well, with the attorney general of each province within the region in question. The committee would propose that such a provision be included in the Constitution. Further elaboration on the consultative process is required, it should be in an Act of Parliament, which could be amended in the light of experience if necessary. However, your committee believes that the existing informal investigatory and consultative processes, properly carried out, are adequate. It sees dangers in too formalized a procedure that may unwittingly exclude highly qualified candidates and prove to be inflexible.

Your committee is opposed to the proposal that appointments to the Court would require ratification by the Second Chamber. Both judges and outstanding lawyers may be unwilling to submit themselves to such a procedure. If the preliminary selection process has been effectively carried out, ratification seems redundant. It has been observed that a ratification procedure exists in other countries, including the United States. We are not accustomed to this in Canada, however, and your committee is concerned that the high quality of appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada that has prevailed to date is unlikely to be improved and could well suffer by the introduction of this requirement.

Your committee also questions the proposed requirement that civil law questions be decided only by the judges appointed from Quebec. There is no similar provision in the present Supreme Court Act although the practice of the Court has been for some time that the three Quebec judges sit on all Quebec cases. Thus on a panel of five judges, normal in cases involving the Civil Code, all three Quebec judges usually sit.

There are difficulties with the wording proposed in the Bill. A civil law question could easily arise in a case in the courts of a province other than Quebec—for example, in a dispute involving a contract stipulated to be governed by Quebec law. It is questionable whether the decision of such a case exclusively by the Quebec judges would help to promote the unifying effect that it is hoped constitutional reform would achieve. Another difficulty is that private law may serve merely to open the door to wider considerations of a public law nature. There have indeed been cases of this kind.

If there were evidence that the participation of common law judges in civil law cases was doing violence to civil law jurisprudence, there might be some basis for the proposal. While there have been complaints in this regard, the material that has been written on the subject suggests that, to the extent that there has been a problem, it occurred many years ago and would not be addressed by the proposal. It is always open to the Quebec legislature to nullify what it is convinced is a bad precedent.

In his commentary on Bill C-60, which was made available to your committee, Professor David Kwavnick of Carleton University, Ottawa, included an analysis of civil law cases decided by the Supreme Court between the years 1960 to 1966. At the request of the committee a similar analysis for the period 1967 to 1978 was made by Mr. Jeffrey Lawrence of the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament and both these analyses are attached to this Report as Appendix "B".

The analyses demonstrate that the vast majority of cases (over 90% in the 1967-78 period) were decided in the manner proposed by a majority of the civil law judges on the Court. In no case did a Quebec judge not participate in the majority decision. In the very small percentage of cases in which a common law judge or judges were decisive as to the outcome of the case, the questions although technically arising under the Civil Code, involved matters of interpretation of the language used in a contract, the application of facts to the law and questions other than questions of civil law theory or doctrine.

Since the Supreme Court Act was amended several years ago requiring leave to appeal, the number of private law cases heard by the Court is likely to diminish for the reason that they will not meet the required test of national importance. Moreover, the practice is that the applications for leave from Quebec are heard by a panel containing at least a majority of the Quebec judges.

While it is obviously desirable that the Quebec judges participate in civil law cases, your committee considers that there should be no requirement that questions of civil law must be decided exclusively by them. If in truth the problem being addressed is more "felt" or perceived, than real, as was suggested by witnesses from the Department of Justice (Senate Committee Proceedings, Issue No. 5, page 55), the most that should be written into the Constitution or, preferably, the Supreme Court Act, is that a majority of the Quebec judges must sit on all cases raising questions of civil law and on all applications for leave to appeal in such cases coming from the Quebec courts.

Respectfully submitted,

RICHARD J. STANBURY,
Chairman.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 24, 1978

The Senate met at 1.20 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE LATE HONOURABLE JOHN JAMES GREENE, P.C.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is with deep regret that I report the death, at approximately 6 o'clock last evening in hospital, of our colleague, the Honourable Joe Greene. Senator Greene was a great Canadian and a great parliamentarian, someone respected and admired by all of us in this chamber and by those who served with him in the other place. At a later and more appropriate time, a full opportunity will be accorded for tributes.

Our heartfelt sympathy is extended to his wife and family.

SHIPPING CONTINUATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-11, to provide for the resumption and continuation of shipping on the Great Lakes and certain other waters.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move second reading of the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I shall, of course, be asking for leave, after second reading, for further consent to complete the bill at all stages as quickly as possible.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I am afraid we are being placed in the same situation in which we were last week on a bill concerning emergency legislation to deal with the strike of postal workers. However, because we heard that the Minister of Justice, in the House of Commons, had moved an amendment to clause 10 dealing with the time this bill will come into force, and because we do not want to be accused of delaying the passage of this legislation, we, on this side of the house, consent to second reading now.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I rise simply, even at this late hour, to protest against this travesty, this mockery, this burlesque of the legitimate legislative process.

I am not going to repeat what I said on the last occasion but one when we had a bill of this sort before us, but I think it is high time that the government—this government or some future government—brought in permanent legislation to deal with this kind of situation. It is an utter absurdity that now, twice in one week, we should be asked to consent to emergency legislation which rams down over the heads of the parties to the dispute an ad hoc compulsory arbitration, instead of providing some kind of proper permanent machinery for compulsory arbitration.

It is all very well to talk about free collective bargaining, but in essential services now there is in fact no free collective bargaining. There is just a ritual dance, a charade and a considerable loss to the country and a loss of wages to the people concerned. And I wish to voice my protest against our being subjected repeatedly to this kind of nonsense.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I thank honourable senators for consenting to proceed with the bill, even at this unreasonable hour.

I must comment on the remarks of Senator Forsey. To call the proceedings of negotiation that preceded the action tonight a mere ritual and charade is, I think, not fair to either the shipowners or the unions concerned. Negotiations did take place, and the strike has been of short duration. I cannot allow any remarks, which reflect on either of the parties, to go unnoticed.

The question of legislation which would deal with situations where the public interest requires intervention by the legislative authority, instead of relying on the ordinary proceedings of labour negotiations, is another subject which must be dealt with, as was the case last week, under the legislation affecting the public service, and the Labour Code dealing with the private sector. I do not propose to make any remarks about that tonight other than to indicate that meetings are taking place, as honourable senators know, between management and labour in an attempt to find some workable solution to deal with that problem by placing legislation before Parliament. When that legislation will come before Parliament, I cannot say. I do not believe in looking into a crystal ball in order to give answers on that kind of subject. As most honourable senators know, that is impossible to undertake with any degree of accuracy.

The loss consequent on the strike, or the tying up of Seaway shipping, is great indeed. I do not know that an accurate estimate of it can be made, because if the strike continues to the end of the shipping season—which is usually in the first 12 or 14 days of December—the loss becomes very great because there is then no more shipping on the system until the following next April. On the other hand, if we are dealing only with the past few days the loss would be much less, although it is great even at that. In any event, I believe honourable senators would agree that that loss to the economy demands action by the legislative authority. This loss would be most acute in the area concerned with the movement of grain from western Canada. The damage to that industry is immediate and is affected by all shipping on the lakes.

The need for the legislation is, I think, clearly established in terms of the public interest. Our duty to serve the public interest far overrides the right of the parties to the dispute to take any further time in trying to arrive at a settlement through the normal channels of negotiation. We do not retract from the process of negotiation. In fact, negotiations were pursued assiduously to the latest possible moment.

Unlike the Postal Services Continuation Act, which we dealt with and passed last week, this bill is concerned with the private sector, involving the Canadian Lake Carriers Association and the Canadian Marine Officers Union. There are some 353 marine engineers involved in the dispute. The other strike affecting shipping on the Great Lakes had to do with the Canadian Lake Carriers Association and the Canadian Merchant Service Guild and involved some 500 deck officers. That strike was settled through the mediation process.

Subclause 4(1) of the bill reads:

The term of the collective agreement to which this Act applies is extended to include the period beginning on June 1, 1978, and expiring on May 31, 1979 and may be further extended by the arbitrator to include the period beginning on June 1, 1979 and expiring on a date not later than May 31, 1981.

The reason for the addition of the extra two years relates to the fact that the parties to the dispute which was settled arrived at agreement between themselves on the longer term, and there is reason to believe that the longer term is therefore acceptable to those employees affected by this bill.

The bill itself orders the immediate resumption of shipping operations on the Great Lakes, which involves all members of the Canadian Lake Carriers Association. It provides for the determination of a collective agreement by arbitration. It provides for the appointment of an arbitrator by the Minister of Labour following the coming into force of this legislation. As honourable senators who followed the proceedings in the other place will know, it is hoped that within hours an arbitrator will be appointed to whom will be referred all matters relating to the amendment of the collective agreement now existing between the parties. The bill, of course, permits the arbitrator to deal with the extended time, and it provides that he must report his arbitration decision on all matters referred to him within 60 days of his appointment.

[Senator McIlraith.]

Honourable senators will note that this bill provides for the appointment of an arbitrator. Since all mediation procedures were fully exhausted in this case, there was felt to be no point in appointing a mediator.

I want also to bring to the attention of honourable senators the clauses which deal with the injunction proceedings. The purpose of this provision is to clarify the situation so that the courts shall issue an injunction, unlike the somewhat more doubtful procedures there now are for injunction proceedings under the Labour Code. The advantage of that is that it would provide a more direct method of having the courts deal with the situation if—and we do not expect this to happen—either side should refuse to obey the legislation. The procedure under the straight penalty provisions of the Labour Code means the gathering of evidence, involving quite a long delay in the process.

The injunction proceedings as set out in the relevant clause are somewhat different in that they enable any action to be brought before the courts and adjudicated immediately, and it is hoped that it will be a more satisfactory method for all parties involved in the dispute.

I do not know if there is much more I can say about the bill at this point. I believe that many honourable senators have been watching the proceedings in the other place rather closely since the bill was introduced there yesterday afternoon, and throughout the course of the evening when it was dealt with more fully at the committee stage.

I believe the bill will commend itself to honourable senators, and I conclude my remarks with the hope that it does.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, for the second time within a week I am called upon to answer the arguments of my colleague Senator McIlraith concerning the passage of emergency legislation such as the bill we are considering this evening.

When on behalf of the official opposition I agreed to proceed immediately with second reading of the bill, I did so reluctantly because I feel that the action of the Senate this evening is not likely to enhance the prestige—I have said so before and I say over again—of the Upper Chamber. While the other place spent hours examining a very important bill, since its objective is to prevent workers from exercising a right recognized in our statutes, we are asked to do it in a few minutes.

Senator Lamontagne: No.

Senator Asselin: Well, Senator Lamontagne says no. It is 1.40 a.m. If we spoke all night long we would be told that we have contributed to the deterioration of conditions and have to assume the responsibilities. I say that we are facing a false dilemma. We are asked at 1.40 a.m. to consider this bill thoroughly. The House of Commons has taken all the time it needed. I followed on television the proceedings in the House of Commons and I think that the bill was thoroughly considered.

Senator Lamontagne: It was not an outstanding performance.

Senator Asselin: It was not an outstanding performance; I hope my colleague, Senator Lamontagne, will have an opportunity to say so in public later. He will be able to comment on the speeches made and on the arguments advanced by the ministers of his government, by the members of the official opposition and by those of the New Democratic Party.

To put it in a nutshell, we are expected to make an intelligent study of this bill which came to us about an hour or an hour and a half ago. We are told that the situation is urgent. Some will say that it is a matter of public interest, of course, since several hundreds of marine employees will be out of work. Some will say that if the matter is not settled within the next few hours, the Lake Carriers Association, those who manage the ships, will simply stop their ships and will not take them out in winter or rather before the beginning of winter.

Some will say that this will mean losses of several millions to grain producers, western farmers and iron producers. Earlier I went through a statement by Iron Ore Chairman, Brian Maloney, who said this and I quote:

[English]

If we can't ship for the balance of the season, it's going to be quite disastrous.

[Translation]

Bill Marshall, the vice-president of the wheat pool, also said:

[English]

—the dispute would have more impact on the Canadian economy than a postal strike, and he urged the federal government to give it top priority.

[Translation]

So if we discuss this bill too long we will be accused of contributing to this economic disaster which is getting ever more serious. That is why I say that we are placed in a strange position and that we must bear our responsibilities and say, in the short period of time available to us, a word regarding the legislation before us.

Honourable senators, I repeat what I said last week when we passed an urgent piece of legislation. I think that whatever government is in power, this government and this Parliament, which we all are part of, is wrong when it passes urgent pieces of legislation such as the one before us and believes that it will contribute to resolve problems in the area of labour relations.

Something must certainly be wrong in labour relations because every now and then Parliament is called upon to put aside an existing law and adopt an emergency measure and to say: We had given you the right to strike but because you are using it we are withdrawing it immediately in the public interest even though this right to strike is granted by a law of Parliament. In my opinion, we should intervene only when people who are entrusted with such a right misuse it in such a way that they jeopardize the public interest of the nation. Now, a few days ago those people were using that right to strike. We say to them: Gentlemen, although we have given you that right, we take it back immediately even though you did not abuse it because we as parliamentarians think it is in the public interest, that there will be serious economic consequences if Parliament does not pass such a legislation. That is the situation we are faced with. Are we going to keep on denying to those people a granted right which is found in a democracy, that is to press their claims through a legal strike in the labour field?

I am not saying that in many cases some unions did not abuse that right, true. However, if we really want to withdraw the right to strike from those people in the public service, let us be honest enough to pass a bill saying: we are withdrawing the right to strike in essential services. Let us at least have the courage to pass such a law. As long as such an act has not been sanctioned, I think we err in saying that we will restrict the right we granted them through another legislative measure.

To my mind, we should find the mechanisms, perhaps by consulting an expert in labour legislation, for on-going consultations between workers and employers. Should we not, as soon as a collective agreement is signed by the parties, get down to work immediately and entrust to a committee of experts, or persons representing the employer and the employees, the problems confronting both parties, in order to avoid, when the collective agreement comes up for renewal, being forced into passing a blackjack bill that tells them: We are withdrawing the right to strike we gave you.

Honourable senators, two acts of that nature in one week is surely a precedent for this Parliament and something other parliaments have seldom witnessed.

Naturally, the Minister of Labour explained the situation this evening in the other place. I heard him. He gave very good reasons to justify introduction of this bill. The Minister of Justice came up with very good arguments as well. But, what I would like you to understand is that Parliament, in a democracy such as ours in Canada, should not be called upon, at every turn to pass an emergency bill such as the one before us to restrict fundamental rights and freedoms. I think it is not to the credit of this Parliament that in one week it should have passed two pieces of legislation of this importance.

As I suggested last week, honourable senators, we hope that the legislation we passed concerning postal employees would be complied with. That is what everybody wants. But if we have now reached the point where acts of Parliament are no longer respected we are finding ourselves in a rather difficult situation from a social standpoint. It is with regret that I must say that what I had anticipated last week, well, we are seeing now—the postal employees have yet to obey the legislation we enacted last Wednesday.

In this case, will the people coming under this emergency legislation follow the example of the postal workers and disregard the legislation passed by Parliament? Will we have to, as we are now doing with the postal employees, ask the courts to issue injunctions to force the employees back to work? I think that is a negative approach to labour problems and employee-employer relations.

If you follow the development of jurisprudence and court decisions concerning injunctions—and I discussed this with the sponsor of the bill as we came in the house tonight—you would see that the courts are not inclined to grant left and right the injunctions they are asked to issue.

You are aware no doubt of a decision by the Superior Court in Montreal last year which refused to grant a group an important injunction, saying that the courts should not be intervening all the time to solve labour conflicts. Also, you saw that Quebec Provincial Labour Minister Johnson last week—I believe it was last weekend—in Montreal was considering removing the application for injunctions in labour disputes. He said that it was not a way of dealing with problems between interested parties. Will the courts in this case and in the case of the postal workers grant the injunctions we will be seeking to ensure compliance with a legislation passed by Parliament?

I hope that the injunction procedures will be started as soon as possible to ensure that the law will be respected. But in view of the tendency of certain judges to grant injunctions, it is doubtful that some injunctions will be refused because the judge must, before granting an injunction, rule on the advantages or the balance of advantages and disadvantages for the public interest. Honourable senators, I also read the bill—I could of course talk for several hours about this bill. But what good would this do?

The bill was passed by the other place and we are asked to make a detailed and comprehensive study of this measure at 1.55 a.m. However, when I read clause 9, I was surprised to see that the provisions concerning the offence will apply to whole groups of people, to union members, and this bill tries to establish guilt by association. Clause 9(3) reads as follows:

On an application under section 8 for an injunction directed against a union—

—and so on—

—it is sufficient proof that the union has failed or refused to comply with a provision of this Act to show that an officer or representative thereof or a substantial number of the employees who are, or at the time of the alleged failure or refusal were, members thereof, failed or refused to comply with the provision—

I think it is a mistake to want to establish a crime by association by taking a group of employees instead of one person or an association.

More and more, the legislators have a tendency to introduce in their bills this new legal principle which I do not find acceptable since it becomes a principle of presumption juris de jure instead of a principle of presumption juris tantum.

I would like the sponsor of this bill to explain how the government will succeed in implementing this clause of the bill concerning a crime by association, or how it will be able to lay charges against union members, or “a substantial number of the employees” and force them to defend themselves by saying: “No, we were not there. We were not able to prevent this from happening.”

Honourable senators, those are the few comments I wanted to make concerning this bill.

● (0200)

[English]

The sponsor of the bill has suggested that we should not refer this bill to a Committee of the Whole because all arguments have been put forward in the other place. I agree with him. I have very carefully followed the arguments put forward by the Acting Minister of Labour and the Minister of Justice. I feel that we cannot ask any questions other than the ones that were asked in the House of Commons earlier.

After the sponsor replies to my remarks I may have other questions to ask him regarding this bill, but for the moment I will not insist that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, one of the results of this strike situation is that certain innocent parties are suffering more than those immediately covered by this bill. I refer, of course, to the grain producers who have been losing export sales amounting to some $10 million a day. It is a sad state of affairs that working farmers should suffer a greater loss of income than the very employees involved. That is my first point.

My second point is this. While the Canadian Wheat Board does a wonderful job of selling our grain, it is unable to guarantee delivery, and because of the present strike Canada is getting a bad name amongst our grain customers all over the world. I think this is something that should be kept in mind when the government and others are exploring alternative means of settling disputes between labour and management. Not only do we get a black eye in the export markets of the world, but we lose customers, we lose foreign exchange, and it is a definite loss for Canada.

The grain situation today, from a standpoint of sales and the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board, is an outstanding success. But the bottleneck and the difficulties are in the transportation and delivery system. The Great Lakes, of course, are part, and a very important part, of that delivery system. The other half of the delivery system is on the west coast, and that, of course, is not provided for by this bill.

The challenge to the government is to make certain that our grain shipments reach our customers. Part of the difficulty is in the shipment east and part of the difficulty is in the shipment west, where there is a horrible lack of terminal facilities. I should think that it is very much in the economic interests of all Canadians that the government and others should address themselves to this situation so that we can, in fact, hold and expand our markets for grain in the interests of grain producers, and in the interests of the whole Canadian economy. Here is a golden opportunity to expand our sales and increase foreign exchange.

The bill presented in the other place was sent to us before it was dealt with there, and I believe there were one or two, and perhaps more, amendments in the other place. At least a couple of them were very important and far-reaching amendments. I refer to clause 4(1), which initially read:

The term of the collective agreement to which this Act applies is extended to include the period beginning on June 1, 1978, and expiring on May 31, 1979.

From that it would seem that we are perhaps just a few months away from a repetition of this very situation. An important amendment was moved, and the following words were added to that clause:

...and may be further extended by the arbitrator to include the period beginning on June 1, 1979 and expiring on a date not later than May 31, 1981.

I would express my own hope, and I am sure that of other honourable senators, that the arbitrator may be successful in extending this collective agreement for an additional two-year period, so that we are not back here within a few months, perhaps within a year, doing the same thing all over again.

To make our night vigil perhaps worthwhile, there was an amendment to clause 10 of the original bill, which provided:

This Act shall come into force on the day following the day on which it is assented to.

That was amended to read:

This Act shall come into force on the day and eight hours after the time at which it is assented to.

● (0210)

Of course eight hours would seem a reasonable period of time—a necessary period of time—to get the workers back on the job, and the ships operating.

I would now like to ask a question of Senator McIlraith. I wonder if he knows whether there will be a determined effort to extend the shipping season beyond December 10, so that the shipments that have been lost in the last nine or ten days may, in fact, be taken care of in this particular period of time.

There is a growing body of opinion that believes the Seaway can be kept open year round. Icebreakers and modern equipment should be able to extend the season. Some authorities think it may now be possible to keep it open year round. I would make the plea to all who are involved that they do everything possible to extend the shipping season up to Christmas, shall I say, so these sales, the shipments, that have been lost today may, in fact, be recovered. I would think that this will go a long way to satisfy the western producers, who feel very much aggrieved at the present time. I would think that if this kind of determined effort were made, it is quite possible the shipping season may be extended so that, in fact, these shipments, these sales, are not lost to the producers.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, before the sponsor of the bill has the floor, I would like to point out to him a mistake in the French version, in clause 10. Naturally, they proposed an amendment and it reads:

La présente loi entre en vigueur le jour de sa sanction huit heures après le moment de sa sanction.

I think it should read:

La présente loi entre en vigueur huit heures après le moment de sa sanction.

I think that mistake ought to be corrected.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator McIlraith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I shall deal briefly with some of the points raised by Senator Asselin and Senator Argue.

The point was raised about our expectations with respect to the union's obeying the law as embodied in this bill, bearing in mind the attitude of the postal workers to the bill that was passed by this house last week. The information I have is that the union has indicated publicly, and to Labour Department officials, that it will obey the law when it is enacted. The union has made that clear.

Senator Asselin: When did they say that?

Senator McIlraith: They said it twice. The minister dealt with the point rather fully in the other place and indicated, from the remarks made by the union directly to the departmental officials concerned with the negotiations, as well as the union's public statement on two occasions, that he believed they intended to obey the law as soon as it was enacted, and that the result would be, since the deck officers had already settled their dispute through the guild, that the ships would be starting to operate this afternoon; that they would be operating as quickly as that. It is a matter of getting the ships ready. They would have them in operation immediately, or as soon as the ships can be put into operation. There is no reason to believe otherwise.

A question was raised regarding the extension of the shipping season. For years I have watched the closing date of the shipping season on the St. Lawrence Seaway. I was more concerned with it in earlier years, and I watched it as a matter of interest in later years. Of course, that matter is determined by the weather. It is not so much a matter of ice forming in the channels, but ice affecting the operation of the locks. I can only hope that an effort will be made to keep those channels and locks open as late as possible.

There is an interesting side issue that is not germane to the bill. There are others in the country farther to the east who are less interested in seeing Great Lakes shipping extended later into the season. Those people like to see products shipped by train to the ports of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. In any event, the point raised by Senator Argue with respect to keeping the grain moving as late in the season as possible is well taken. An effort should be made to keep the Seaway open until later into the season.

The movement of grain is of tremendous significance to the economy of the country in both the sheer volume of it and the foreign exchange aspect of it. The necessity of servicing the sales to ensure reliable delivery is of the utmost importance, otherwise the market is lost in the long term. That is the real danger.

We have talked a great deal about the agricultural industry, but there are also large amounts of foreign exchange earned by the forest industry, the paper industry and the iron ore industry. In any event, I don't think more need be said on that subject at the moment.

I now wish to deal with the point raised regarding injunction proceedings. I hesitate to represent myself as being the authority on the law. I think that is a very dangerous position, and the wrong position, to take in a legislative body. However, I would point out that the injunction proceedings set out in this bill are specific and particular. They are not the general injunction proceedings that we have read and heard so much about over the past few years under the Labour Code and other public service legislation. Rather, it is an application made to the Trial Division of the Federal Court, with provision for appeal, of course. Subclause 9(2) states:

—it is sufficient proof that the company has failed or refused to comply with a provision of this Act to show that an officer . . . failed or refused to comply with the provision whether or not the officer . . . is identified—

The significance of that, of course, is that it would eliminate the rather lengthy and doubtful proceeding that now has to be undertaken. This provision clarifies the situation in respect of the proof required to obtain injunctions. Subclause 8(1) clarifies the situation greatly for the courts and removes some of the difficulties with which they have been faced in injunction proceedings in the past few years.

Another point Senator Asselin referred to was the matter of crime by association. In fact, it is not crime by association. If the honourable senator reads subclause 9(3), he will find that it is crime by the action of those persons concerned, which is not the same thing. If it were crime by association, it would be a different thing altogether. What is being sought to be achieved here is to remove the necessity of proving that the officer of the company did a certain thing or sent out certain instructions, and so forth. This would make the mere fact of the individual's disobeying the law grounds for granting an injunction, and breach thereof would of course constitute the offence of contempt of court.

I think a more careful and fuller reading of the subclause will indicate that it is not crime by association; rather, it is crime by the action taken by the individual that leads to the creation of the offence.

Honourable senators, I do not think there is anything more that I can usefully add.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator McIlraith.]

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, with leave, I move third reading now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, before the passage of this bill on third reading, I wish to come back to a suggestion I made earlier concerning the possibility of Senator McIlraith and his friends opposite urging the government and the Department of Labour to establish a mechanism for permanent and continuing consultations and negotiations to avoid the passage of emergency legislation as we do tonight and as we did last week.

I think it would be possible to find a continuing consultation mechanism by means of a committee sitting continuously and which would report to management or labour to pinpoint contentious matters during the term of the collective agreement and to foresee the difficulties both parties might face in the negotiation of a new collective agreement.

I think that honourable senators have always in the past made excellent suggestions and that the other place should study carefully this opportunity to present to the government suggestions that might significantly improve our labour legislation and our labour relations in Canada. Does Senator McIlraith believe instead that our house might study this aspect of the problem? Might we make a report later to the other place, or to the government, or to the Minister of Labour?

[English]

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Asselin for his remarks and I shall certainly bring them to the attention of the government. As I indicated earlier, the government is at present conducting meetings with management and labour with a view to finding somewhat better solutions to the type of problem we were concerned with last week and again this week, by way of having them dealt with by some other process than the enactment of a special act of Parliament on each occasion. I know that the honourable senator's remarks will be of concern and great interest to those who are seeking to find a solution with a view to bringing forward general legislation to deal with this type of situation.

I thank the honourable senator.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I regret to rise again, but I want to make it perfectly clear that in what I said at an earlier stage I was in no way whatsoever reflecting upon the parties to this dispute. I was reflecting upon the snail-like progress of the government in bringing down the kind of legislation that Senator McIlraith now says it is contemplating. This problem has existed for years. It has been getting steadily more acute, and I am delighted to hear that the government is at last moving, but it seems to me that it has been moving as slowly as if it were driving a snail ahead of it.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE LATE HONOURABLE JOHN JAMES GREENE, P.C.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, it was with deep sadness that we heard last night of the death of our dear colleague, Senator Joe Greene. Joe Greene was everything a person in public life should be: he was committed and caring; he had an unquenchable desire to enrich his nation, and the nation received full value from him, and more. He drove himself without reserve in public office, and though eventually his health was broken, his spirit never was.

During his six years in the Senate, Joe Greene was combative, outspoken, witty, warm and wise. He was born in Toronto in 1920, and received his public and high school education there. After graduation he worked in the mines of northern Ontario for three years. In 1941 he enlisted in the RCAF and served overseas for three years before being discharged in 1945 as a flight lieutenant. During his service years he was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross and was mentioned in dispatches. After the war he continued his education and he received his law degree with honours from Osgoode Hall in 1950. He then proceeded to establish a law practice in Arnprior.

He became active in public life. He was a member of the Arnprior Municipal Council and he served on the Renfrew County Council before being elected to the House of Commons in 1963. Thus he began his distinguished career in Ottawa. He was named Minister of Agriculture in 1965 and, later, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

He brought to Parliament the gift of oratory. Few of us on this side who attended the Liberal leadership convention in 1968 will forget his speech on that occasion. The "Abe Lincoln" of the Ottawa Valley was moving and magnificent.

Newspaper clippings often told of vintage Joe Greene performances. He was never a bore. He was controversial because he was never equivocal. He knew where he stood and he let every audience know exactly why.

A speech he made in Denver in 1970 was typical. He stressed positive Canadian nationalism rather than anti-Americanism. He later explained that Canadians knew what they were against, but some were not very certain as to what they were for.

Nobody could be in any doubt of what Joe Greene was for. He gathered no splinters sitting on the fence. Typically he once praised Canada by saying "there are few places where it is as easy not to conform." Joe Greene conformed to nothing but his own beliefs and principles.

I have just read an interview he gave to a columnist from western Canada prior to the Liberal convention. He said that Canadians of French descent must be made to feel at home in every province if Canada is to remain united. He said he realized that this may not go over big in some parts of the country. "But," he said, "I don't sing one song there and another elsewhere." Joe Greene sang the same song everywhere. It was a song of optimism for Canada and its people.

All the while he pushed himself hard. He suffered heart attacks and later suffered a stroke while on government business in Japan in 1971. He was called to the Senate the next year and ever after brightened our deliberations with his wit and style.

When he resigned as a cabinet minister early in 1972 the Globe and Mail said in an editorial that, while his portfolio had been filled, there was nobody to fill his role as custodian of the cabinet's sense of humour. It went on to say:

Warmth, wit and grace are at least as important as energy, mines and resources—and a great deal rarer.

In a way that editorial was Joe Greene's political epitaph. It will also serve as a fitting epitaph for Senator Joe Greene, the man we admired and loved. Our deepest sympathy goes out to his wife Corinne and their five children.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, it is always a sad occasion when we have to acknowledge the passing of one of our colleagues, especially one who has been with us so often and so devotedly in our sittings since he came to us as a senator. We knew of his reputation before he came. We knew that he had achieved great success as a representative of more than one constituency, as a member of Parliament, and as a cabinet minister. We expected great things of him when he came here, and we were not disappointed.

It will be difficult for those of us who sit on this side to look across at that chair, where so often we expected to see Joe rise and, with one of his witty interruptions, throw us for a loop for a minute or two until we recovered ourselves. Joe had that tremendous special quality of a politician, which is the ability to be partisan, highly partisan, to provoke response, but never to give offence. That is the way I remember Joe.

I did not know him in his earlier days, although I knew of him. But later I came to love him as he sat across the chamber here and occasionally put me over a barrel, as only Joe could. He was an ornament to this profession, if it is a profession, or art, that we who endure the contumely of being called politicians recognize. Joe was an ornament to the profession. He was loved. He was loved by his constituents, by his colleagues, and loved here in this place, and I am sure that no honourable senator would disagree with me for one minute about that.

It is not the easiest quality in the world for one to acquire, to be highly partisan, highly political, and be loved by those you criticize. But such were the qualities of Joe Greene, and I am sure that is the quality that every senator here feels the loss of at this sad moment.

● (2010)

The Leader of the Government has indicated some of the areas of Joe's great successes: municipal politics, federal politics and in many other areas of community activity. I think what Joe would like us to think of him, now that he is gone, is that he died in harness. I am sure this is the way Joe would like to have gone, and this is the way he has gone from us. He was here devotedly attendant. When it was difficult for him to come and attend our sittings, he came, he participated, and he was in harness when he left us.

I join with the Leader of the Government in telling his dear wife that we know she will miss him. We will miss him too. He was a great ornament as a family man. He was a great ornament to our Senate.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I find it a bit strange to pick up the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of Thursday, October 19, 1978, and see the name "Greene", indicating that he was present on that date. He won't be here physically, but Joe will be present in spirit in the chamber for a very long time.

I had known him for many years. We had been friends and we had worked together. I was one of a group who some years ago approached him to run for the office of Liberal leader in the Province of Ontario. He was reluctant, pointing out that he had a young family who needed him. He had not had much of an opportunity to make satisfactory financial arrangements for the future. But we insisted—I am not so sure that we were right—and he finally agreed to run. A little late. He was narrowly defeated.

Those who knew him, knew that he was alert, bilingual, a first-class orator and legislator. In 1964 when the government established a Joint Committee on Consumer Credit, Joe and I were co-chairmen. We worked together for a year. He was particularly anxious to see that people would not be buried in debt. His wit and his ability eased some blows. I think what is most remembered and was indicated is that when he became a candidate for the leadership of the Liberal Party of Canada in 1969, he did not win but he left an indelible impression upon the people who were there.

All of you have attended conventions and all of you know that there comes a time when there is an appeal made to those who have not got a chance: "Get out, will you?" The hope is that you can pick up some of their supporters. I remember that when we went to Joe and asked him to get out of the running he said, "Oh no, politics is like a horse race; you never know. I don't think I can win, but a great number of people have bought tickets on me and I have to give them a run." And that is the way it was. As a matter of fact, we had a fair idea as to how many votes he would get, but in the end he fooled us by getting twice as many.

I am sure that some of you now present were at that convention, and most of you should have been there. Do you remember the last day of the convention when the candidates were making their last pitch? Joe was the last one to speak, and the crowd was getting impatient and tired. The feeling of "Let's get out of here as quickly as possible" was becoming quite noticeable. When Joe stepped on to the platform the level of the chatter from the crowd was so loud that you couldn't hear yourself think. Joe approached the front of the platform in Lincoln-like fashion, tall, slim and slow. He spoke without the assistance of a text, and in a loud voice called attention to the fact that he was about to speak. Suddenly the crowd became intent. They listened and became excited when Joe started talking, gesticulating in his own way, about liberalism, philosophy, hope in the achievement of the future of his beloved Canada and a united Canada. This was one of the greatest orations I have ever heard while attending conventions, and I have attended a great number of them. The crowd cheered him on, and that made Joe that day.

Joe didn't lose; he just didn't get enough votes. That reminds me of a story told about Sir Wilfrid Laurier, which I am sure is true. When given an overwhelming reception in Toronto he said, "You cheer for me, but you don't vote for me." That is what happened to Joe that day.

It has already been mentioned that he suffered a stroke, but, despite his physical disability, his brain was alert and keen. Why, it was just last Thursday that he was up on his feet in this house on a question of privilege.

● (2020)

As I said earlier, I had the privilege of knowing Senator Greene for many years. Such men come to public life too late and leave too soon. He never ran with the crowd. He served this country in peace and war. He was a decent man, an humanitarian. He was a cheerful, warm-hearted man, a man who wished good things for all God's children.

The Senate is poorer today, and we in the Senate mourn his death. We extend our sympathy to his lovely wife, Corinne, and his wonderful family.

Hon. Bernard Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, it is quite obvious that this evening we all feel a deep sense of loss at the death of our distinguished colleague, the Honourable Senator J. J. Greene. To all of us he was a man of sterling character and remarkable courage. Senator Grosart has said that Joe was respected and loved by all of the people who knew him. To me, as is the case with so many of my colleagues, he was a very special friend.

Both Senator Perrault and Senator Croll made reference to his speech at the 1968 Liberal leadership convention—a speech which many people still believe to be one of the greatest political speeches ever made at any time or at any place in our country. He was a great Canadian, and was respected wherever he went in Canada.

Just over three short weeks ago, I had the privilege of accompanying Senator Greene to a conference in Switzerland. During a debate on international problems, Joe spoke so eloquently on the principles of freedom and democracy—principles which he himself espoused and held so dear—that he had the complete and undivided attention of every delegate in the auditorium.

Despite physical adversity in recent years, he continued to impress and inspire all of us with his keen mind and sharp intellect. His extraordinary sense of humour is almost legendary.

Honourable senators, we live in an age when cynicism and distrust have become almost respectable, a time when some people are prepared to believe that any person who serves in public office is serving only himself, a time when we look behind every person's words to discover the selfish and dishonest motives which some people believe are always there. In such an age, it is very reassuring to have known people like Joe Greene, a person of conspicuous and unquestioned loyalty.

Someone said recently that in the hierarchy of the qualities of character by which a man lives his life and is judged by his fellow men, there is no more important a quality than personal integrity. What higher praise can anyone give than to say that a man's word, whether given in public or in private, can be relied upon absolutely?

Indeed, our friend Joe Greene had many such fine qualities. But most of all he was an exemplary family man. I join with my colleagues in extending to Corinne and to his sons and daughters our expression of very deep sympathy.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand: Honourable senators, only silence can adequately express our feelings in the face of this terrible reality—the sudden passing away of our friend Joe Greene.

However generous, sincere or even poetic, words can be nothing more than pale shadows of the deep feelings which move us. With you, I bow before the one who was our beloved colleague and whose last breath vanished through the mysterious and impenetrable forces of death.

If we are to do something for our friend Joe Greene, we should all go to Arnprior to express our sympathy to his wife who has been admirable during the long years of agony of her husband.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I want to add a word about my friend Joe Greene. I remember the occasion referred to by Senator Croll. I was chairman of the convention when Joe presented himself as a candidate for the leadership of the Ontario Liberal Party. That was his first step on to the larger public stage, and a spectacular debut it was.

I remember Joe as a Canadian who thoroughly understood and deeply felt two very important principles. Not only did he understand and feel them, but he could always articulate them so eloquently—the rule of responsible government and the rule of law.

Although Joe represented a constituency outside the Ottawa Valley, he was a Valley boy and was always thought of as such. On behalf of the people of Lanark County, a part of the Ottawa Valley where Joe was so well known and so well loved, and to whom he was a genuine folk hero, I want to associate myself with everything that has been said this evening, with the well-deserved and well-earned eulogies expressed tonight by my fellow senators.

THE SENATE

EMERGENCY SITTINGS—NOTICE TO SENATORS—QUESTIONS

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government a question which appears to be on the minds of a number of senators who have spoken to me. It relates to the sitting of the Senate in the early hours of this day. Would he be good enough to advise the Senate as to whether all senators were notified of the intention on the part of somebody to call a sitting of the Senate at that particular time? I am asking if all honourable senators were advised, being aware, of course, of the fact that our rules require that such notice be given at whatever the residence of record is of honourable senators. Perhaps he would answer the question because I know it concerns a number of senators who have said to me, "I never heard anything about it," and that includes myself.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know that every effort was made to communicate with as many senators as possible to inform them of the emergency situation which existed. However, I would be pleased to prepare a fuller statement and explanation. Perhaps I can make that available in the course of this week.

I think honourable senators are quite aware of the fact that an extreme and unanticipated emergency existed late on Monday. Had ordinary circumstances prevailed and, had time permitted, telegrams would have been sent out in the ordinary fashion. However, that process would have been delayed by a number of critical hours the resumption of work, and I understand that a prolongation of the strike would have caused additional and costly economic difficulties. As I have said, I have been advised that every effort was made to communicate with as many senators as possible. Unfortunately, in certain instances it was apparently impossible to effect contact. I, too, have been informed by certain senators that no message got through to them.

Senator Grosart: May I also ask the Leader of the Government if he can answer this essential question: Was an attempt made to contact every senator? Either by telephone, by telegram or in any other fashion, was any attempt made to contact every senator? Indeed, was every senator advised that there was a sitting of the Senate at the time in question?

I do not want to raise the question at this time of whether the Senate actually sat. Some might wish to raise that question. My recollection is that there was an order of the Senate that we would sit tonight. Perhaps that in itself raises the question whether, when it is made in the future, such a motion should include the proviso that is sometimes included that Her Honour the Speaker may, if necessary, call the Senate at an earlier time.

Senator Croll: That is in the rules.

Senator Grosart: I am merely raising the question. I do not want to go into the whole question of the legality of this thing, but I think it is of the utmost importance that at all times when the Senate is called to sit every senator, if he can be reached, should be advised that there is a sitting of the Senate. We must be most careful that no sitting of this Senate in future should ever be called on the basis, if this was the basis, of some one person's selecting the senators who are to be advised that there is a sitting.

I think the question is important. A sufficient number of senators on both sides have called me to ask about this matter that I think is important—and I may say that in my position as the Acting Leader of the Opposition I was not formally advised. In my opinion this is a serious situation. I can understand that the Leader of the Government will wish to take my question as notice. I am sure he will be as concerned as I am, if the concern of some senators as expressed to me has any basis in fact or is justified.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question posed by the Honourable Acting Leader of the Opposition is both sound and important. I can only reiterate that to the best of my knowledge, taking into account the lateness of the hour and the circumstances, appropriate efforts were made to communicate with as many senators as possible. There was no select list of senators to be contacted. I understand some senators were in transit. I know, personally, of some of the efforts made, and they were indeed extensive.

The honourable senator has advanced the view that some procedure be established to meet these situations should they occur again. There may be real validity to the point. We seem to be moving to these extraordinary procedures with greater frequency than heretofore.

Apart from that, concerted efforts were made involving a great deal of effort to contact at that late hour as many honourable senators as possible. I know of certain cases where the telephone was not answered. I am prepared to take the question as notice, and I will provide further answers that honourable senators may require.

Senator Denis: As a supplementary, may I ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning those senators who were not advised of Monday's meeting? Those senators were unable to be present because they did not know about it.

Senator Perrault: In reply to the honourable senator, tonight's sitting is a continuation of the sitting which, if he will check the time, commenced after midnight this morning. Those senators who are in the chamber this evening are meeting fully their attendance obligations for today's sitting.

Senator Denis: On Thursday we adjourned until Tuesday. So even though we did not attend Monday's sitting, we are present for today's sitting.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, my question is a supplementary as it relates to the same subject. I refer particularly to the approximately seven or eight senators who have their offices located at 140 Wellington Street. In my view there are inadequate transport facilities provided to enable senators to attend emergency sittings of the Senate. Because of the inadequate bus service it is difficult for them to get to their offices on a weekend to serve their constituents. May I ask the Leader of the Government to look into the diminution, and in some cases cancellation, of bus services, and try to correct the situation for the benefit of the people of Canada whom we are trying to serve?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I suggest that any information which the honourable senator may have with respect to a deterioration in service should be communicated as soon as possible to the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee. Certainly I share the honourable senator's concern for any lack in the quality of service.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, perhaps I should direct my question to the chairman of that committee and ask him to investigate the lack of service in order that we might serve the people of Canada in the way they expect.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, may I mention that the report of the Selection Committee has not yet been dealt with and voted on. Therefore the Internal Economy Committee does not exist. Although I was chairman last year, I may not be the chairman for the present session.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators may feel assured that the Internal Economy Committee will be formed within the next few hours.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, when the Leader of the Government provides the answer to the question, will he tell us exactly what happened, who was notified and how they were notified? I was here yesterday evening, and I heard on the CBC this morning that there was an emergency meeting last night. We have heard a good deal of criticism of the Senate, and I would like to know how we are supposed to know there is a sitting if we are not notified.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the situation will be reviewed. Happily, the Senate was able to expedite the passage of an extremely important measure of value to a great many Canadians.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I think it is wonderful that those people who were here expedited that measure. But how about the people who were not here and who were not notified? The Senate has suffered a lot of criticism, but if we are not notified and cannot be here, how can we know if we would have been in favour of the measure or not?

POST OFFICE

DISRUPTION IN SERVICE—QUESTIONS

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, has the Leader of the Government in the Senate news of any progress that might have been made with regard to the postal strike?

Senator Perrault: No reports have been received lately; however, it is my understanding that those workers of the Post Office who do not report for work in approximately 24 hours from now—a deadline of one minute past midnight tomorrow night has been set—will be considered as no longer being employees of the Post Office Department.

Senator Asselin: Is it true that the strikers are not obeying the injunctions which have been issued by the courts? If the answer is in the affirmative, what other ways and means does the government intend to adopt against the strikers to compel them to obey the law that we passed last week?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that in at least two population centres workers are being advised by their leaders to defy the injunctions obtained from the courts. As far as other measures are concerned, a number of alternatives are being considered, but certainly it is not the intention of the government to allow a group of workers in this important area of activity to continue to defy a decision taken by the Parliament of Canada and the decisions taken in the courts, defiance which is causing so much inconvenience to Canadians from coast to coast.

Apart from this I am not able to specify, and I do not believe it would be prudent to delineate the alternative courses of action which may lie ahead.

Senator Walker: Might I ask the Leader of the Government whether we have found out how many of the leaders of the Post Office workers are communists, and how many of them were trained in England and Scotland when there were about 1,500 Soviet agents in those countries about 10 years ago? Would the honourable leader look into that? The manner in which they are all acting is beginning to look very odd.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

Senator Denis: May I mention this to the honourable leader? I know of a woman who tried to get into a post office in order to work, but she had to go back because she was afraid of being injured by the bouncers who were stationed around the Post Office.

I am aware that the honourable leader has said that the offenders would be out of work, but are those who are willing to work going to be protected 24 hours a day? The person I have referred to wanted to work, and she is not alone. There are many Post Office employees who are ready to work, but who are afraid to go near their place of employment because of the dangers they face there.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if any honourable senator knows of examples of alleged intimidation, that information should be made available at the earliest opportunity to the minister responsible for the Post Office. In the meantime I shall endeavour to have an up-dated report on the Post Office situation available for honourable senators before we rise this evening. Information will be sought in the next 15 minutes on what progress, if any, may have occurred in the early evening.

FISHERIES

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH SEPARATE DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Honourable the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question concerning Bill C-65, entitled the Government Organization Act, 1978, part I of which deals with the establishment of a separate department of fisheries and oceans. Could the honourable leader impress upon the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment the importance of establishing such a department, and can the leader obtain from the minister information as to the date that this legislation might be re-introduced in the present session.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question must be taken as notice. The information is not immediately available.

GOVERNMENT ACTION AFFECTING FISHERMEN IN ATLANTIC CANADA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, although I am not at this moment able to answer the honourable senator's present question, I do have the reply to a question asked by him on October 18 last.

The honourable senator's question, in part, was as follows:

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question having to do with the fishermen in Atlantic Canada. In view of the continuing fears about a definitive decision by the government, first, concerning the future of the fisheries research laboratory in Halifax, secondly, closing the weather station at Gander, and thirdly, the cut-back of marine broadcasting, even though there has been some representation otherwise, could the leader extract from the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment a definitive decision on the government's intentions?

The honourable senator has raised questions relevant to programs recently affected by announced federal government spending cut-backs. First, in the case of the proposed closing of the fisheries technological laboratory in Halifax, the Honourable Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, following representations made to him, agreed to review the decision to reduce secondary technological research at the lab. A decision on this question is expected in the near future. It must be pointed out, however, that any reduction to staff, if implemented, would affect the national program, and involve considerably smaller numbers than the media have been quoting for Halifax alone. It is also important to recognize that any decision to reduce federal government assistance would only affect secondary industry technology. Reduction of technological support to the fishing fleet has not been, nor would it be, considered. As well, efforts of the department in fisheries research and stock assessment are not only being maintained, but increased. I am confident that the honourable senator appreciates the need for time to carry out a further review and re-appraisal of this particular program.

With respect to the closing of the weather station, the honourable senator, I am sure, is aware by now that forecasting services will not be transferred to Halifax but will continue to be provided, as in the past, from the Gander weather office. As well, the atmospheric environment service of the Department of the Environment has been instructed to ensure that the quality of weather services in Newfoundland and Labrador is maintained at current levels. Specifically, there will be no cut-back in the number of daily weather forecasts for the province, nor any reductions in the frequency of marine broadcasting.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government a supplementary to the question asked a moment ago by Senator Marshall about the proposed department of fisheries and oceans, or "the" oceans. I wonder if the government might give consideration to selecting a somewhat less grandiloquent title for that department. We used to hear that "Britannia rules the waves," but apparently, henceforth, it will be, "Canada rules the oceans." I am also reminded of the scriptural phrase, "I have made Ethiopia my wash-pot, and over Egypt have I cast out my shoe." It appears that the government is now proposing to make the Pacific its wash-pot, and over the Atlantic to cast out its shoe. When I saw the title of that bill I was astounded at the inflated terms which had been used.

I should really like, apart from any facetiousness, to suggest that it is a somewhat absurd title.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in view of the honourable senator's noted wizardry with words, I say on behalf of the government that we would welcome any alternative suggestions which may emanate from his inventive mind.

Senator Grosart: You will be sorry.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MCDONALD ROYAL COMMISSION—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, through the Honourable Leader of the Government, may I put a question to Senator McIlraith? There was a question asked in the other place today concerning Mr. Higgett, the former Commissioner of the RCMP. He testified before the McDonald Commission that the Solicitor General had been apprised of a planned break-in by RCMP officers before it occurred.

● (2050)

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I do not think the honourable senator can ask such a question of a member of this house if he is not a chairman of a committee of this house.

Senator Asselin: I will direct my question to the Leader of the Government. I wish to give Senator McIlraith an opportunity to correct a statement which has been given before the McDonald Commission.

Senator Langlois: Order!

Senator Asselin: I want to know if Senator McIlraith has something to say about this statement which has been made before the commission.

I do not want to take any direction from the Deputy Leader of the Government. If the Speaker of the Senate wishes to stop me from speaking, she may ask me to resume my seat and I will do so immediately.

Senator Langlois: She has been motioning to you.

Senator Asselin: I will not take any orders from you.

Senator Langlois: The Speaker is on her feet now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senator, questions should be addressed only to the Leader of the Government.

Senator Asselin: May I ask this question of the Leader of the Government now? Senator McIlraith, a former Solicitor General, was accused today of having given permission to Commissioner Higgett and his agents to break the law. I am referring to certain incidents which occurred in 1970, 1971, 1972, and 1973. I think Senator McIlraith is aware that this statement has been made.

The Hon. the Speaker: What is your question?

Senator Asselin: I will get to it. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he is aware of this statement, and if so, will he give Senator McIlraith an opportunity to rise on a question of privilege in order to deny this statement which has been made today.

I should also like to know if the Leader of the Government can advise me if this question has been discussed in the Cabinet, and also if he knows whether the government is going to produce some documents that have been referred to before the commission.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is difficult to determine whether this is an earnest search for knowledge or a fishing expedition. However, I will take the inquiry as notice.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CLOSURE OF WEATHER STATIONS IN NEWFOUNDLAND AND REGINA—QUESTION

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. My understanding is that, among others, two weather stations were closed—one in Newfoundland and one in Regina, Saskatchewan. My further understanding is that before the federal by-elections the weather station in Newfoundland was re-opened—politically, to no avail, as I understand. However, the one in Regina was not re-opened—politically, to some avail because the Liberals were wiped out in that province. My question is: If the weather station in Newfoundland was re-opened, why was the weather station in Regina not re-opened?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, obviously there was at least some stormy political weather in Saskatchewan last week. Apart from that, I have no specific knowledge immediately at hand, but an inquiry will go forward.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 19, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Rizzuto, seconded by Senator Bird, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, may I first of all express my condolences to the attractive and hard-working widow of the late Joe Greene, and also to his family who are a remarkable group of people. Joe was a great jury lawyer. Many a time we congregated in his office, when some lawyers like his great friend, Doug McConachie, came up from Toronto to the Supreme Court, and hashed over old times. Joe was a gentleman of the bar and a gentleman of the house. Without a doubt, he made the best speech of any of the candidates for the leadership of the Liberal Party. I was there, and I gave a $200 contribution to one of the candidates.

I congratulate Senator Rizzuto on his excellent speech. Senator Rizzuto, formerly from Italy, has not only become proficient in the French language, but also proficient in the English language. And I congratulate Senator Bird whom I have known for years. She is the widow of a former well-known and well-liked member of the Press Gallery.

I should also like to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition who, unfortunately, is not here tonight, on the most remarkable speech of any speech made in the Throne Speech debate to date. He gets better every day. Nine years ago I nominated him for the leadership of our party, largely because he is French Canadian. He has turned out to be a wonderful leader and one that everybody is proud of, including the Deputy Leader.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Walker: May I also say a word about you, Madam Speaker? I feel I could go no further without doing so. You have had an amazing influence on this house. Without taking any firm measures, without naming anyone, and without throwing anyone out, you, because of your personality, have kept order without any effort on your part. We are delighted to have you play the part that you do, and we regret to think that your term may be over when the government changes. We must see if we can do something to keep you on, because you are doing such a fine job.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Walker: I have been asked, and it is my privilege, to say a word about the Honourable Alan Aylesworth Macnaughton. He has been a friend of mine since 1958 when Lester Pearson nominated him as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. I was elected as counsel for the committee. At that time I thought, "Oh, this fellow is going to be a push-over," and I thought I would be able to rip him apart. However, in his capacity as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, he was such a nice person, such a competent one, and such a fair one, that he really established his reputation in that committee. That committee investigated the building of the Printing Bureau in Hull. Of course, a shocking disclosure took place, and he must have been embarrassed as a Liberal chairman of that committee day after day as the tale unfolded. However, he kept order, and when the great four horsemen came in to interrupt and tried to break it up, he still kept order. When the committee wrote its report condemning the former government for its waste and extravagance in building that edifice, which was to have cost $6 million but which eventually cost $18 million, it is to the credit of Alan Macnaughton that the report was unanimous. He served for four years as chairman of that committee, and it was no wonder that when Mike Pearson, my old professor at the University of Toronto, became Prime Minister in 1966 the first person he would name as Speaker of the House of Commons would be Alan Macnaughton.

I go on to tell you that when Alan Macnaughton finished as Speaker of the House of Commons, none other than former Prime Minister John Diefenbaker said, and repeated many times, that he never at any time found a fairer and more able Speaker than our former colleague Alan Macnaughton. I am talking about a Liberal, and I am talking, too, with enthusiasm.

May I just say one or two more words about Alan Macnaughton? He had to retire when he was 75. He has retired from the Senate, but not from his law firm which, with 58 lawyers, is one of the largest in Canada. He is still the counsel of Martineau, Walker, Allison, Beaulieu, MacKell and Clermont in Montreal. He is still director of about 20 companies. He was director of 40 at one time. He was Chairman of Pirelli Canada Limited, Chairman of Canadian Offshore Marine Limited, and he presently is a director—I will not give you the whole list—of Ontario & Minnesota Pulp and Paper, Aviation Electric, Brown Boveri Canada Limited, Cunard International Canada Limited, Federation Insurance, Miramichi Timber Resources Ltd., Saelectric, and many other prominent companies. Particularly, he is the adviser to the International Committee for the Swiss Bank Corporation. He is still a director of that corporation. He has done more than any other Canadian to promote business between Switzerland and Canada. He is still a director of the famous Hoffman-La Roche Limited and Sapac Corporation.

I am not going into all his achievements. He was Chairman of the Roosevelt Campobello International Park Commission. He created great goodwill with the United States. He was Chairman of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations, and of the Trans-Canada Environment Committee; Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, always serving under the distinguished Chairman, Senator Hayden, and serving with great distinction.

Alan Macnaughton was never defeated in all his tries for the House of Commons. For that I envy him. I got beaten in Rosedale in 1962. I couldn't understand it at the time. But when the swing goes the other way, don't feel too badly, members of the Senate on the other side. When the time comes it really comes with a vengeance. He was never defeated. I remember twice in Mount Royal he had the largest majority of any member of Parliament in Canada. He gave up his seat to the Prime Minister—one of the mistakes he made. After all, you know, he didn't have precognition of what was going to happen. Eventually, but not for some time, he was appointed to the Senate.

May I say this about him in conclusion? He is the type of person we don't very often find in politics. He was always modest, always soft-spoken; he never boasted, never blew his own horn. Yet from job to job he succeeded—on the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, on the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group. I was just amazed last year, on my first attendance in New Orleans, to see the American senators and congressmen get up to praise Alan Macnaughton, who retired as chairman of the committee on that day.

Therefore, it is my pleasure, as a Tory, to put on record a summing-up of a great Liberal, who made a very distinct contribution to Canada. Quite contrary to most politicians, he never lost his cool; he did everything that he could by persuasion. If they ever want to get a good person to arbitrate that awful mess in the Post Office they couldn't get anybody better than Alan Macnaughton. Long may he be spared many happy days in the future.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Walker: I want to congratulate my leader, as I think I already have, on his remarkable showing. I also want to congratulate the Leader of the Government, not on his speech on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne—because it was, you know, a tub-thumping whitewash of the government, which is just what I would expect; very nicely done, and very much to be expected—but on his magnificent showing during this summer when he, day in and day out, at the risk of being himself thrown into the wilderness, upheld the rights and privileges of the Senate, the reputation of the Senate. He never gave in at any time. He allowed himself to become unpopular for a time in doing so. I think everybody in the Senate, be they Liberal or Conservative, owe a great debt of gratitude to the leader of this house for his exhibition this summer.

May I also, as one who, because of doctors' orders, was ordered off the committee, congratulate the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada and the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution of Canada. Every member of the Senate and every Canadian owes a debt to the members of that committee. If I may say so, Senator Forsey—although I very seldom praise him, he quite often bores me—was the hero of the piece, and I hope all of us appreciate what he did in connection with this awful matter of Bill C-60.

Tonight the subject of my sermon is the three wise men. They are all professors, all very intellectual, all very brilliant, all theorists; but, unlike many professors in this Senate, who work pragmatically, they have no sense of administration, and all of them failed.

Just let me show how fair I am. I am going to bring in a Tory first, Professor Sidney Smith. He was my professor at Osgoode Hall; a lovely fellow. He wore the mortarboard with distinction, and the robes. He was a good President of the University of Toronto. When he got down here as Minister of External Affairs he sat over there, and I sat immediately behind him. At that time, before I got to the cabinet, I was the Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Justice. He would start to shake when Mr. Pickersgill and the others asked him questions.

Senator Asselin: And Paul Martin.

Senator Walker: And Paul Martin, particularly; that's right.

I remember him once turning around and asking, "What will I say? What will I do?" I replied, "In your own polite language tell the . . . to go to hell." You know, that cooled him off.

He never got used to the house. Even in committees he was very nervous, and it eventually caused his death in 1959. Mark you, having said all that, he was a marvelous man. I am only talking about the subject I am leading up to.

Professor John Evans had also been President of that great University of Toronto—the most prestigious job that any academician can hold. His sojourn, of course, was short but sweet. He could not understand people. During the by-election campaign he was bored, browned-off and disillusioned. He felt he had been taken for a ride by the Prime Minister. He was badly defeated in my old riding of Rosedale by David Crombie, whose future as a man of distinction is just beginning.

The Damon and Pythias relationship between the Prime Minister and Evans finally ended. Before that as they both sat on the platform, in their mortarboards and fine robes, they were able to discuss things. The siren song went forward to Evans: "You know, if you come into Parliament perhaps you could succeed me as Prime Minister." Evans fell hook, line and sinker. His ego was tickled. He took the bait. As Shakespeare said:

Vaulting ambition, which o'erleaps itself,

And falls on the other.

The result was dismal. He looked brokenhearted. And I want to tell all you Liberals on the other side, including the organizer, Senator Davey, who should be there but isn't, "Don't worry about Evans." He'll never run again. He's had it. I am sure he has. That is a second professor.

As I say, all professors are not failures. You have examples here such as former Professor Flynn, Professor Goldenberg, Professor Hicks and least—no, last but not least, Professor Forsey of McGill.

I come to the third professor. We have had Smith, Evans, and now Professor Trudeau. He was not really a professor. He was an Assistant Professor of Law at the University of Montreal. That is the first real job that he ever took in his first 45 years. He was pretty good as a lecturer at law. Very good. His rise was meteoric. Trudeaumania became the fashion. His charisma charmed everyone. It charmed even me. I remember thinking in 1968, because separation had raised its ugly head during the regime of Lester Pearson, that here is a French Canadian, and a very brilliant French Canadian, who will solve this matter and solve it quickly. So, like so many other almost millions of Canadians, there was delight when he became Prime Minister.

The first thing he decided to do was to have a "just society". He would redistribute wealth in a sort of semi-socialistic society. Giving away government money was the main object. It looked to be a never-ending process—redistribute the wealth.

Five years later, when the "just society" didn't work and the money was getting low, he decided to plan a socialized welfare bureaucracy because, he insisted, private enterprise had failed. Well, he never did believe in private enterprise. But now, after 10 years, when he has so dismally failed, with no chance to succeed before an election, he turns at last to the system that he has always detested, always run down, always spoken against, and this made him sometimes suspect of being other things because of his bitterness toward it. He turned, finally, just a few weeks ago, toward individual initiative. He became a great supporter finally, after 10 years as Prime Minister, of private enterprise.

He will try this just long enough—he has it started now—to make it the scapegoat for the failure of his previous 10 years, and then he will turn saying that he has given this private enterprise thing a trial, and it is a failure. The country is nearly broke now, but it will be completely broke when it gets through with this. He will turn to what he has always planned and admired—absolute government; perhaps a presidential system ending in a dictatorship.

We know he likes dictatorships. "Castro, my dear friend." It is the only time I have ever seen Castro smile. Mao-Tse-Tung was a great friend of his. Mao-Tse-Tung was a great man. Khrushchev was a great man. He has friends in all the communist countries. But thanks to you and your committees, that ill-fated Bill C-60 to amend the Constitution failed. It failed dismally. If I have the opportunity some day, I would like to outline to you—but you have probably come to the same conclusion yourself—how it was a blueprint for becoming the dictator.

In the meantime, thank goodness, we brought an end to all this nonsense. The results of the 15 by-elections point out his awful failure. It is a rude awakening. We do not deserve credit for this—not too much credit. When the Tories won 10 of the 15 seats and the Liberals lost 12 of the 15 seats, that must have been, even to him, an awful eyeopener. From now until the next general election the question will be: Are you going to be with Trudeau, or are you going to be without him?

Senators on the other side have been kicked around. We have been too. We shared it with you, but we expected it. We are the opposition. You would have been just summarily dismissed to oblivion through this bill. There was no consultation with you. You were just going to be kicked out without any say about it at all.

Let's just think about who we would get if we did not get Trudeau. The best men have left the Liberal cabinet. There have been a total of 34 resignations or firings from the cabinet since April 1968, when Trudeau became Prime Minister. I am going to read their names without comment. Just think what good fellows a lot of them are. They are very distinguished people: Ron Basford, Edgar Benson, Leo Cadieux, J. J. Côté, Jack Davis, Charles Drury, Jean-Eudes Dubé, Francis Fox, C. R. M. Granger, H. E. Gray, Joe Greene, Stanley Haidasz, Paul Hellyer, Pierre Juneau, Eric Kierans—he was one of the first to go—Arthur Laing, Donald Macdonald—my opponent who beat me in Rosedale—George McIlraith, Bryce Mackasey, P. M. Mahoney, Jean Marchand, Paul Martin, John Munro, Martin O'Connell, H. A. Olson, Gérard Pelletier, Jean-Luc Pepin, James Richardson, H. Robichaud, Maurice Sauvé, Mitchell Sharp, R. D. G. Stanbury, Roger-Joseph Teillet and John N. Turner.

There is the list. Who are left? Well, there is Mr. MacEachen. He is a pleasant and respectable person. Jamieson—I don't mind calling him a smooth windjammer. Lang—he can talk out of both sides of his mouth at once—holds three portfolios and juggles them all at the same time. Chrétien—a good fighter, as he describes himself. Bud Cullen—able; watch him, because at some time in the future he may be your leader. But there is nobody of genius left in that cabinet except, of course, the Prime Minister himself—but he is an odd genius. Why are they left? Well, they know how to butter him up. If you didn't, watch out.

The organizer, Senator Keith Davey, left when he heard I was going to speak. You cannot blame him for doing that. He wanted an early election. I was going to give him credit for that. He wanted an early election before the force of public opinion became so clarified. We can't blame him. He counted on an early election, but he is now like the salesman out with what some people call a "crappy line" to sell. It is like trying to sell Firestone tires at the present time. They are unsaleable until they are replaced. Davey is a good actor. He is loyal and says the Prime Minister is a wonderful fellow, and is doing a good job. I can't go on any further because I can't stop laughing.

Those in waiting for the leadership? I don't see anyone else except John Turner, the "Bonnie Prince Charlie." All the Scotsmen, the French Canadians and English Canadians are, with united voice, crying out, "Will ye no come back again." He is a very nice man and a friend of mine. I like his personality, but what about his record of accomplishment? This is not meant to be personal, I want to be completely impersonal—that's right, Heaven forbid.

Senator Guay: Well, I don't—

Senator Walker: I don't get interrupted when I talk about Trudeau, but when I talk about the person who is in the wings, I do. I haven't noticed you doing a great deal to distinguish yourself in the Senate, Senator Guay, except to make rude interruptions which I can't hear at this distance. Get up and make them if you wish.

Senator Guay: I will. Madam Speaker, I do not know what the honourable senator is making reference to. I was not addressing myself to him. If he wants me to address him, I can tell him that I don't agree with the statements he makes about the Prime Minister. I think he should also take into consideration, while criticizing the Prime Minister, where he would place Joe Clark in relation to the three musketeers to whom he keeps making reference.

Senator Walker: This is not a question, Madam Speaker, but a speech.

Senator Guay: If the honourable senator wants to know what I have to say, I can go on much longer and also make a speech.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Asselin: Ask him what happened in his riding.

Senator Walker: What happened in your riding? Did you win it for the Liberals? Don't make a speech about it.

Since you have reminded me, I will talk about Joe Clark. Thanks for the thought. However, I will go on with what I was saying.

In the 44 months during which Turner was Minister of Finance, spending by the federal government jumped 98.8 per cent. That is pretty close to 100 per cent, isn't it? To put it another way, it took us 105 years to reach a spending level of $17.4 billion. John Turner doubled that figure in 44 months, taking the level of government spending, in his brief term, to twice that reached by any government since Confederation. Under the budgets he brought down, $113 billion of taxpayers' money was spent. When Turner took over from Edgar Benson, inflation was running at 4.9 per cent. When he left it was running at—what do you think? Six per cent? No, it was 10.6 per cent. This is Bonnie Prince Charlie we are talking about.

Under Turner, the cost of living jumped by 38.5 per cent. The dollar, if one assumes it to have been worth 100 cents when sonny boy—I mean Turner—came in, was worth 72 cents when he walked out in 1975.

You might as well know these figures now because they will all come out during the election campaign. In 1972 there was a surplus of $700 million in our current account balance, a surplus equivalent to our country's chequing account in international trade. In 1975 there was a deficit of almost $5 billion. That was during the term of Mr. Turner.

In the aggregate, since John Turner took over, the nation has had a current account deficit every year—every year—and Canada will have a deficit this year of at least $11 billion, and some say more. Last year and this year Canada will have the largest current account deficit of any of the industrialized nations in the world, Great Britain and Italy included.

So, when John Turner got the job as Minister of Finance, real growth in this country amounted to 6.6 per cent. That was before he got in. What do you think it was when he left? Was it 3 per cent, or 2 per cent? No, it was 0.3 per cent. On a per capita basis it didn't amount to anything. That is the leader who some people think is a substitute for Mr. Trudeau.

I don't know why people have changed so suddenly in their opinion of Trudeau. It has been coming on gradually, but I know he was a hero around my place for many years. Why are they sour on him? I think one of the reasons is that he has expressed many times his supreme contempt for Parliament, and he has a particularly supreme contempt for the Senate to which he appoints members assiduously. He has a contempt for us, as evidenced by the fact that he never consulted anyone before bringing down Bill C-60.

Now, he could not keep up that charisma. That is gone, and in its place there is distrust for Trudeau in his ability to govern or to settle Canada's problems. The papers are using the word "hate." I don't think that is the proper word. But if it bears any resemblance at all, Lord Bacon said once that hate is love's dark opposite. When the people got through loving him, they went to the other extreme.

Look at what he has done to his own cabinet. He has just thrown them out wholesale. What did he do with the Senate? He would have thrown honourable senators out, ne'er to be heard from again. Most of the survivors—

Senator Bosa: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Walker: Why, of course, particularly from you, my friend.

Senator Bosa: Did Flora MacDonald ask you whether you had consented to the House of the Provinces?

Senator Walker: As a matter of fact, she never did me the honour of discussing that matter with me. But she obviously did discuss it with you. She said she thought she had some approbation of it if it were amended properly, didn't she? To my mind, it was the damndest bill that was ever suggested to man. At some later date I would like half an hour to discuss it.

Look at what Trudeau has done to his own cabinet and what he has tried to do to the Senate. Most of the survivors—and this may be the crux of the matter—most of the survivors, not all, are sycophants. That is the reason they still have their jobs.

I am not looking at you, my friend, over there in the corner. You are an organizer. He needed you and you did a good job in Ontario in the recent by-elections. You tried hard. It wasn't your fault that you didn't win any seats.

No wonder he is upset. He now knows that he cannot govern Canada. Why not? Well, Eric Kierans, now a professor at McGill, was one of the first to leave the cabinet. He left the cabinet in disgust. He did not get fired; he quit. He said of Mr. Trudeau that he is impossible. He has said that while he can make marvellous speeches, he cannot run anything. He has no idea whatsoever of how to be an administrator. That is not his fault. The Lord has showered gifts on him, but not the gift of common sense; not the gift of pragmatism; not the gift of administration; not the ability to direct the affairs of Canada.

He does not know how to get things done. It is getting worse. He talks more now than he ever did before. He takes more holidays than he ever did before. He knows that he cannot accomplish anything, and he now thinks, as he must think, that the only thing to do is to talk. As a result, he talks more, and more, and more.

He went down the Danube in a boat with the great president of Germany, Mr. Schmidt. He was so filled with vim and ginger when he got back that he ordered all of the radio and television lines to be cleared and he made a roaring speech. I bet he cannot remember what he said. It was something concerning $2 billion. Was he going to spend it or save it? I don't know, and I am sure that today he wouldn't know either.

He hates the routine of work. That is why he likes to take so many holidays. He just doesn't know how to work. He never learned. He has been a dilettante all his life, a gentleman with lots of money. He puttered around with socialism; he puttered around with newspapers that would be distributed about the streets of Montreal, and so on. Until he became an associate professor, he had not done anything seriously that I know of.

Now, would you listen just briefly to this summary of figures? I will try to make it short and very simple. These figures will demonstrate what has happened to us.

The gross national product since 1968, the year Mr. Trudeau became Prime Minister, has increased by 55 per cent. The money supply in that same period has been increased by 155 per cent. Isn't that amazing! A 300 per cent increase in a short 10-year period.

Next: since 1968 the rate of inflation has grown from 4.5 per cent to what the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development predicts will be, this year, 12 per cent. Think of it! Just think of it!

Next: unemployment has increased from 375,000 in 1968, when he became Prime Minister, to over 1 million this year.

Next: Canada, with 8.3 per cent of the total labour force unemployed—I hope you will listen carefully to this—has the highest unemployment in the industrialized world, exceeding the United States, which has 6.1 per cent; exceeding Italy, which has 7.5 per cent; and Germany, which has 3.6 per cent. When you get down to Japan, you find that country has an unemployment rate of just something over 2 per cent. Think of that!

Next: since 1968, government expenditures have multiplied by four and one-half times—four and one-half times in 10 years!

Next: the consumer price index has increased from 89.4 per cent to, not 100 per cent but 168.9 per cent. The consumer price index has doubled during the reign of Trudeau the Magnificent.

Next: since 1968, the purchasing power of the dollar has fallen to 52 miserable cents. It is worth less now than at any time, even at any time during the Great Depression.

Next: the International Labour Organization tells us, in its latest statistics, that Canada headed 55 countries in the number of man-days lost through strikes. Think of it. We lead the world. We will more than lead the world when we get through with what we are in the middle of now. According to those statistics, Canada has lost 2.27 days per worker, compared with one day per worker in the United States. In 1976 there were 800,000 man-days lost due to one event, the Canadian Labour Congress Day of Protest. The Canadian worker produces much less than the American worker. We can never get over this economic bind until we encourage our workers, as they have now done in England, to increase productivity.

Finally, the tax burden per worker in 1968 was $383. Last year, it was $1,446, a 375 per cent increase. The interest on money borrowed by Canada has increased from $893 million per annum in 1968 to $4 billion this year. That does not take into account local loans; this is money borrowed by Canada from abroad. In 1968 the governments of Canada, including the provincial governments, were spending 35 per cent of the gross national product. Now they are spending 42 per cent. Just think of it. Of every dollar that is paid in taxes 42 per cent is spent on government. It is a shocking situation.

Most of these figures have been obtained by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development and, of course, from the budgets.

Now, honourable senators, I am going to restrain my remarks, but there are two great problems facing the government of the day, each intertwined with the other. The first is restoring a badly depressed economy, and with that, of course, I include restraining inflation. Secondly, there is restoring the endangered national unity. Now, we cannot blame the outside world for our condition. They have not done it to us. We are not engaged in fighting a war. We cannot excuse ourselves by referring to crop failures, for the Lord has been good to us. We cannot blame it on a crash such as happened in 1929, and we cannot blame it on a worldwide depression. The truth of the matter is that "The fault, dear Brutus, lies not in our stars but in ourselves." The Trudeau government in recent years—and I am not being personal in this; I am being as serious as I can be because we are all in the same boat, and we share the boat with you—but the Trudeau government in recent years has lacked the wisdom as well as the courage to manage its own affairs. And I must say it also lacks the ability to manage its own affairs. Spending is so completely out of control that those interested are at a complete loss to know where to commence in an effort to regain control. God knows they would like to. For years now Canada has been heading for an economic breakdown while the Prime Minister, apparently, closes his eyes. I don't think the poor fellow has the slightest idea what to do about it. So he has taken the easy course regardless of consequences—spend, spend, spend on any conceivable excuse. Then, when the money runs out—print, print, print more money, and the result of this was a certainty—to destroy the value of the dollar.

Don't wonder what happened to your dollar; it was not anyone picking on us. We in this country have destroyed the value of the dollar ourselves. The dollar not so long ago was worth more than $1.05 American—you remember how pleased we were—and it is now worth approximately 85 cents American, and it is still going down. And that is against a poor, old battered American dollar which itself is down 30 per cent. Just go over to Germany and try to live on American dollars! The American dollar is down 30 per cent in relation to the German mark.

Perhaps Canada's only solution under this government, which apparently lacks the will to control its expenditures, is to appeal to the International Monetary Fund to enable us to peg our dollar at 90 cents American with massive credits from the IMF. It would be a break for the Prime Minister because if you bring in the IMF, they take matters out of your hands and they set the terms. This would be embarrassing for the Prime Minister, but it might help him because he has no idea how to do it. And he seems to be unable to retain people in his department who will tell him how to do it. I remember when I was a minister I went to the army and got General Findlay Clark to help me with the National Capital Commission that runs Ottawa and vicinity, and I used the famous General Hugh Young to help me with public works. They are wonderful people because they understand administration. They are terrific. Of course, it takes two to make a bargain, and what worries me about the IMF is that when they get through outlining their plan and before they would come in, they would insist on Trudeau putting his house in order, and not only stop further needless spending but radically and dramatically cut current expenditures. But the Prime Minister with his pride would only accept such a course as a last resort because in all his ten years in office he has yet to cut down, to slacken or even to hold the line on government spending. He has made lots of wonderful speeches about it; nobody can make better ones, and, no doubt, his intentions were good, but he has never succeeded in doing it. Spend, spend has been the rule. The only possible step to maintain our solvency, and I am very serious in this, is to balance our budget and slow down the printing of Canada's dollars. I predict mournfully that no such arrangement will be made while the Prime Minister is in that position because he would not want to obey the rules set up by the IMF. That would embarrass him and would hurt his pride. And if he did not obey the rules, the IMF would overnight withdraw its credit.

Where is the Governor of the Bank of Canada today? He is an important person. Bouey his name is.

An Hon. Senator: James Coyne!

Senator Walker: I remember him well. What a mess he made of things.

Is Bouey helpless or is he scared of Trudeau? If so he should resign. What is he doing? I have not heard of him. Is he frightened to talk? The Auditor General, Mr. Macdonell, has turned out to be a person who stands up for what he thinks. He has given us the warning: "Spending is out of control." He has done his best.

I remember that in my last year in cabinet in 1962 we wrestled with a total budget of $7 billion—just think of it—$7 billion. The deficit this year alone is going to be $11 billion and some say $15 billion. In 1919 after the tremendous expenditures on the First World War, Canada had a deficit from Confederation right down to 1919—more than 60 years—of $3 billion. Today in one year we have almost quadrupled that deficit. This is going to involve a Herculean task since the deficit by next April is going to be so vast that it is going to shock everybody. Can't we get the worker to realize the plight he is in? You know, honourable senators, one cannot help but admire that fine labour premier over in England. Nobody thought anything of him at all, but he talks firmly and he speaks the truth and he makes the worker like it. He has shown that the harder the worker works, the more money the worker will eventually get and the more prosperous England will become. This is not the rule for Canada, particularly when we can tell our worker that the American who is supposed to be the spoiled boy produces far more than the Canadian. That is not pleasant to hear, but it is true.

Then we have unemployment insurance, and of all the institutions that are being bilked, that is it. How many tens of thousands of people plan their year's work so that they can quit at the proper time to receive the maximum unemployment insurance? How many tens of thousands receive unemployment insurance who are not entitled to it?

I am not an authority on these things and I do not intend to bore you with all sorts of figures and examples, but I do wish to say honestly, ladies and gentlemen of the Senate, that you have been tried and found not wanting. You really did a marvellous job this summer. Your record and reputation is higher than it has been in many, many years. Just think with me on this: combined with balancing the budget we must of course cut down inflation. That is so easy to do, if we would only get about to do it. So much has been said on this subject, however, that I am not going to touch it today.

Our final goal is the one my friend Senator Wagner would put first: national unity. I know it is next to his heart. But nobody knows better than he that you cannot hope to retain national unity when the economy is going into bankruptcy. But we are trying now to restore our national unity. Let us get behind whoever—whatever party is in—does a job on that.

During the Diefenbaker regime, which ended in 1963, I never remember, and I am quite frank about this, hearing any talk about separatism. That does not mean that there may not have been talk and activity, but our cabinet was never faced with that problem. It was faced with many other problems, though. It began mildly at the time of Mr. Pearson, who promised everything to the people of Quebec. He told them: "You have been downtrodden and badly treated. Tell us what you want and we will give it to you." You cannot blame them for starting to stir. There was some truth in what Mr. Pearson said, too.

Then they got along pretty well. It was not too bad. But then along came the brilliant orator, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, to succeed Mr. Pearson. We felt at the time that he was a great Canadian who was interested in preserving Canada's unity. I told you then, and I repeat again, millions of people were delighted to see him because he was a French Canadian, and if anybody could solve the separatist problem he could. And he spoke as if he could.

But finally the people got wise—how wise they got! The by-elections show that. They found that Trudeau, rather than being the cure for separatism, had become in reality one of its principal causes, by reason of his constant—he did not intend this—his constant, angry and futile confrontations with the separatist leaders. The longer Trudeau confronted the separatists, the greater the gap became between the separatists and the rest of the country. So far as I know, no real effort has ever been made by Prime Minister Trudeau actually to sit down and work out a settlement. If there has, I should like to be told of it.

Incidentally, I love the French Canadians. Everybody who knows my past knows that. I spent four summers with them at Ste Croix de Lotbinière on the south side of the river, and I will repeat a story that they told me showing the differences of opinion that can exist:

[Translation]

Napoleon was speaking with his wife, Empress Josephine; she was talking too much, so Napoleon flew into a rage. "Do you know, Josephine," he asked her, "the difference between a mirror and you?" "No," she replied. "A mirror reflects without speaking, but you speak without reflecting."

[English]

Well, Josephine was very angry. She was very angry and she said:

[Translation]

"Emperor, do you know the difference between a mirror and you?" "No, I don't know." "A mirror has polish, but you do not."

[English]

Well, that is the way we are tonight. You see, you on your side are polished and I am not. I am attacking you, but I am attacking you with the greatest of goodwill because I am truly interested in the settlement of the French Canadian problem. As a matter of fact, I even voted for my friend Clause Wagner for the leadership of the party because in fact he was a damned good French Canadian. My leader, Mr. Diefenbaker, did also.

Now the French Canadians, I think, are beginning to pin their hopes on Claude Ryan, the Quebec Liberal leader. He is a sensible sort of person who seems to be a most reasonable man and seems to be able at least to discuss matters with the separatists without losing his temper and making them lose theirs. Mr. Biron, the Union National leader, is a good man, too.

When I tell you that I like René Lévesque, don't get mad at me! I have had a lot to do with him. He was the Minister of Public Works for Quebec in 1960 when I was Minister of Public Works in Mr. Diefenbaker's government. For 30 years the plans had been in the works to build a bridge across the Ottawa River, but the politicians could never come to grips with the problems. They could never agree. They fought one another. Well, I found Mr. Lévesque to be a most reasonable man and, at that time, a most loyal Canadian. As a matter of fact, by his co-operation and affability we reached an agreement; we went over to the Rideau Club and had some drinks and that is when he decided he would go along. We were able to work out together the plan which had been delayed for 30 years, the agreement to build this new bridge to be called, as it is in fact, the Macdonald-Cartier Bridge. The bridge was eventually opened by the Honourable George McIlraith, who succeeded me in Public Works. So the new bridge between Ottawa and Hull was completed after I had left that office.

I give that example to indicate that things can be done with the separatists, if they are approached properly. But you cannot insult them and then expect them to sit down and talk sensibly to you.

In the meantime, something or someone has soured Mr. Lévesque. But I think that, if he was properly handled, he, too, would relent in his views on Quebec. I am not so sure that his right-hand men would, however, and I worry about that.

In conclusion, let me say that Quebec cannot be expected to arrive at a settlement of its problems unless and until unemployment is greatly reduced; until inflation is contained, and until the centralizing power of Ottawa is not only stopped but is rolled back. Those are the problems. They have to be settled before there can be any settlement of Quebec's problems.

But that is true not only of Quebec but of every province of Canada.

Let me finish on this high note: I hope no one will be insulted when I say God save the Queen and God save Canada, a Canada in which Quebec plays and will play in the future its own noble part.

DISRUPTION IN SERVICES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, earlier this evening I promised that I would endeavour to obtain information with respect to the current situation at the Post Office, and with leave, I should like to communicate certain information.

Information has been received from the minister responsible for the Post Office that all postal workers must return to work by 12.01 a.m. Thursday. That is approximately 26 hours from now.

Safe access will be provided for all who want to return to work. Those who do not return to work will be regarded as unemployed.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: May I ask a question or rather make a suggestion or a comment? Is the government leader saying that notice has been given by the minister or his deputy minister to all postal workers to the effect that if they fail to return to work at the said hour, they will find themselves unemployed under the Public Service Act?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, my understanding is that a method has been devised to communicate that information to the workers, and they are on notice that if they fail to return by 12.01 a.m. Thursday—

Senator Asselin: What will happen?

Senator Perrault:—their jobs will no longer exist.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Is that not another provocation on the part of the minister so that the settlement of the postal strike would not come early and a digging-in will result because they are given notices that if they do not return to work by a certain time they will be out of a job? Does the Leader of the Government consider that those employees are often the victims of directives given by union leaders and that they themselves do not have any decision to make concerning their return to work? Is that notice given to postal employees not in fact something that will punish the employees instead of bringing about a final settlement of the issue?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I did add the words "safe access," and I quote the minister:

Safe access is being provided for all who want to return to work.

Having said that, I am sure that individual circumstances will be taken into account in order to determine the status of the workers should they not arrive on the job at the designated time.

The Senate resumed from earlier this day consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Rizzuto, seconded by Senator Bird, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I should like briefly to put something on the record with reference to what might be called political history or political analysis as edited by Senator Walker this evening. The honourable senator is a lawyer, and a very good one; so he knows as a lawyer that silence is not consent. But as a politician, and he is a better lawyer than he is a politician, he and others might think that our silence could be taken as a sign of consent to the dismal analysis that he made of where our country is going, how our country stands, and of the leadership that we should be honoured and proud of having.

His comments were basically interwoven into two categories. One was that the sky is falling, and the other was a Chicken Little doomsday analysis of how terrible things are in this country. I want to go on record as saying that I do not share that view. However, without going into details regarding the difficulties, our performance in this country is something of which we should be proud, not only in terms of economic performance but also in terms of feeling, of sensitive liberal legislation—and I use the word "liberal" with both a small and capital "L".

Personally, I am proud of the accomplishments of the past 10 years and proud of the leadership that has brought them about. To put it as simply as I can, I believe that we have gone through some very tough times. By that I mean tough times not related to a period of economic depression but times that require difficult and tough decisions; and I believe that we are going to go through some more.

I agree with Senator Walker that our economic problems have not been solved and will never be solved completely, that there are tough and difficult decisions to make. I agree with him that our national unity problem is not solved and will not go away simply because people say they do not want to talk about it. The problem will still be there.

So I agree with him that in the future we are going to need very tough, very smart leadership. It is interesting that at no point did he mention his present leader as having either of those qualities. In my view, the toughest, smartest statesman in the Western World is the Prime Minister of Canada, and we are going to need him. Instead of talking about "with him" or "without him," we should be talking about making sure he stays, and not even suggesting the possibility of going into the times ahead without him.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Criticism, of course, is easy. We can always find something to tear down. As I listened to my learned friend's speech—and I do not say that in a sarcastic sense, because as a lawyer he is learned and he has been a friend of mine for 25 years—I was reminded, when I heard the facility of his criticism, the personal bias of his attack, of what Brendan Behan, the playwright, said about critics. He said "Critics are like eunuchs in a harem. They see it done every night, but they can't do it themselves."

Senator Walker: Well, you should know.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

STANDING COMMITTEES

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Senator Petten presented the second report of the Committee of Selection:

Tuesday, October 24, 1978

The Committee of Selection appointed to nominate senators to serve on the several select committees during the present session makes its second report as follows:

Your committee has the honour to submit herewith the list of senators nominated by it to serve on the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, namely, the Honourable Senators Adams, Austin, Beaubien, Bonnell, Côtteau, Flynn, Frith, Hastings, Hays, Lang, Langlois, Lucier, Manning, Olson, Perrault, Riley, Rowe, Smith (Colchester), Steuart, van Roggen, Williams and Yuzyk. (22)

Respectfully submitted,

William J. Petten
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that this report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

BANKING LEGISLATION

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move, seconded by Senator Laird.

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider the subject matter of the Bill C-57, intituled "An Act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend the other Acts in consequence thereof," of the Third Session of the Thirtieth Parliament, or any matter relating thereto; and

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I should like to make a comment on this motion as this is the first occasion in this session on which we are applying once again the now famous Hayden formula to our proceedings. We all agree that the use of this innovative formula devised by Senator Hayden two or three years ago has greatly added to the accomplishments and, therefore, the prestige of the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: In discussions that took place during the past few months the Senate has been under intense scrutiny, and I am glad to say that the Senate has come out of that rather well. One of the components of that has been the work of Senate committees using the Hayden formula. The motion before us now goes a bit further than earlier motions under this formula in that it overcomes what I would call one of the "sillinesses" of our system whereby bills still in the mill at the end of a session automatically die. I believe there are discussions now under way to get rid of that silliness, which would allow the work of committees to carry on. This would mean that bills still under consideration at the end of a session would be reinstated at the same stage in the ensuing session and not have to go through the whole legislative process again starting with first reading.

The motion before us deals with this situation. It asks us to approve a reference to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee of the Senate of the subject matter of a bill that is now dead, that bill being C-57 of the last session of the Thirtieth Parliament. What we are doing under this motion is saying that Bill C-57 of the last session, for all intents and purposes, and for the sensible carrying on of the business of Parliament, is still alive to the extent that it has been presented and discussed in the other place and has been the subject of a number of sessions of our committee. The committee, again using the Hayden formula, held four information sessions before calling witnesses, and the committee is now ready, again way ahead of the committee of the other place, to immediately call important witnesses on this measure.

This is something of which the Senate can be proud. We should compliment Senator Hayden on the fact that he is always on the ball and has us ready to go to work on one of the most important pieces of legislation before Parliament at the present time. The Senate is ready to go to work thanks to the initiative of that committee and its chairman.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), I move, seconded by Senator Laird:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purposes of its examination and consideration of such legislation and other matters as may be referred to it.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, October 26, 1978, at 10 a.m.

Motion agreed to.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON RETIREMENT AGE POLICIES—COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the Senate will meet at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, the scheduled meeting of the Retirement Age Policies Committee for that time will be cancelled. When the Senate adjourns this afternoon, the committee will hold an organization meeting in room 256-S.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move, seconded by Senator McNamara:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to inquire into and report upon such experiences in prenatal life and early childhood as may cause personality disorders or criminal behaviour in later life and to consider and recommend such remedial and preventative measures relating thereto as may be reasonably expected to lead to a reduction in the incidence of crime and violence in society;

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, technical and clerical personnel as may be required for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the two preceding sessions be referred to the committee; and

That the committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE

DISRUPTION OF SERVICE—QUESTIONS

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government if he has anything to add to the information he gave to the Senate last night on the status of the dispute between the government and one of the postal workers' unions?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no further information to add, apart from the fact that as of 12.01 tomorrow morning, employees who have not returned to work could be considered to be unemployed. That does not mean that at that time automatically it will be concluded that all those on strike have abandoned their jobs, but the Post Office will be in a legal and technical position to so declare.

Senator Denis: May I ask what is being done about those employees who want to work but cannot get in to work? Is there any protection for them?

Secondly, those who normally start to work at 4 o'clock in the afternoon would not normally be there at 12.01. I know that some employees tried to get in to work in the Montreal Post Office but they could not do so. So how can they prove they want to work? They are really afraid not only of losing their jobs but also of being fined $100 a day.

Senator Perrault: The question posed by the honourable senator is a very legitimate one. As I say, the Post Office will be in a technical position to declare that certain of its employees are no longer employees of the Post Office, but local circumstances will be taken into consideration. The minister responsible for the Post Office has said that safe passage will be provided where possible for the employees to get to their work sites. Of course, employees whose shifts would normally begin after 12 midnight will not be expected to report at 12.01. The Post Office, above all, would like to resolve the situation without any dislocation of the work careers of any of its employees. Every effort and initiative are being undertaken to resolve this dispute with the minimum of difficulty and economic dislocation for the employees and the people of Canada. Above all, the elements of reason and common sense are going to be the key factors in the process.

Senator Denis: Do I understand that at the present time there is no kind of protection around the post offices for those who want to get in to work?

Senator Perrault: The honourable minister responsible for the Post Office has stated that safe passage is guaranteed for employees who want to work. How that commitment is working out, in fact, at individual post offices, I am not in a position to say. However, again I hope to have an updated report before we rise this afternoon.

DECERTIFICATION OF UNION AS BARGAINING AGENT— QUESTION

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if the government has taken any position or action in the matter of decertifying the postal union involved? It seems almost inconceivable that the government could continue to recognize as the legitimate bargaining agent a union that is in open contempt of both Parliament and the courts of the country.

Has that aspect been considered?

[Senator Grosart.]

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, an inquiry will go forward on that point. At the present time I do not have information concerning that particular suggestion.

GREAT LAKES SHIPPING

EFFECT OF SHIPPING CONTINUATION ACT—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senator, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether there has been a resumption of shipping on the Great Lakes as a result of the legislation passed several hours ago.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the best advice I have received is that shipping has resumed and that the situation is satisfactory and that matters are back to normal.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT PRICE AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA RESPECTING CRUDE OIL—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on October 18 Senator Olson asked the following question:

Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if the government considers the agreement it made with Alberta respecting the dates for changing the price of crude oil to be a firm commitment, or does the government feel this is still negotiable.

The current understanding between the federal and Alberta governments respecting the level of crude oil prices takes the form of an exchange of letters in June, 1977, between the respective Ministers of Energy. They set out the conditions under which crude oil price increases may take place. There is some doubt as to whether the specified conditions will permit an increase in Canadian crude oil prices at January 1, 1979. In view of this, but also and more particularly having regard to our difficult national economic situation, the federal government in August last proposed that there should be a pause in the upward movement of oil and, therefore, gas prices. I should like to stress that this federal initiative has always been characterized as a proposal. I understand that it is currently under discussion with ministers of the producing provinces.

Senator Olson: I should like to ask a supplementary question. I do not expect the leader to have the information with him, but he can take the question as notice. I believe he made reference to the matter being left as negotiable, and I would ask if it is not fair to say that some people in the Government of Alberta regarded the matter as an agreement or firm commitment? Could the Leader of the Government, either some time tomorrow or next week, advise the house which parts of it he thinks are merely an understanding requiring further negotiations?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

POST OFFICE

DISRUPTION OF SERVICE—TERMS OF REFERENCE OF MEDIATOR—QUESTION

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, when the Leader of the Government makes his report on the postal strike, could he tell us whether the mediator is already at work? There were reports in the news media yesterday that the mediator had been complaining that he had not so far received any terms of reference covering his mediation?

● (1420)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be answered as soon as possible.

DISRUPTION OF SERVICE—COMMUNIST INVOLVEMENT—
QUESTION

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government inform us whether he has yet ascertained if behind this strike, particularly at the top, there is communist involvement, because there seems to be an effort toward creating chaos and anarchy in connection with this dispute. There has been no success so far in resolving it. My honourable friend, the Leader of the Government, has said that he would take this or that question as notice, and he is doing a very good job in that regard; but time is passing and the strike continues. The union is so adamant in refusing to negotiate that one begins to wonder whether or not there is an effort being made toward creating anarchy.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that information has not yet been received. An inquiry has gone forward and I shall provide further information as soon as it is available.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

McDONALD ROYAL COMMISSION—QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, further to the question raised by Senator Asselin at the sitting of the Senate last evening, I wonder if the Leader of the Government is now in a position to inform the Senate whether it is the intention of the government to present a statement to the Senate on the allegation, if that is what it was, of a former commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that there was presumed, if not explicit, approval given by successive former solicitors general to illegal activities entered into by that distinguished force.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no further information available to enable me to make a statement at this time.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. Would the Leader of the Government indicate whether he has discussed the matter with his colleague, Senator McIlraith, and whether in the circumstances Senator McIlraith intends to testify before the McDonald Commission, either to confirm or refute Commissioner Higgitt's statement?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, no meetings have yet been held to discuss this matter.

POST OFFICE

DISRUPTION IN SERVICE—APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR—
QUESTION

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, has the government considered, in the appointment of a mediator, the name of the former member of the Senate, the Honourable Alan Aylesworth Macnaughton, who has been notable as a mediator all his life? He is a man who does not ruffle any feathers, yet can be extremely firm and intelligent.

May I ask the Leader of the Government if he will at least suggest his name as one who in a crisis such as this might be of considerable assistance to the government and to the cause.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the honourable senator's proposal will be taken into consideration.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith moved the second reading of Bill S-2, to implement an agreement between Canada and Malaysia and conventions between Canada and Spain, Canada and Liberia, Canada and Austria and Canada and Italy for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

He said: Honourable senators will have noticed that Bill S-2, a bill originating in the Senate, was formerly Bill S-9. I propose to make only two points in support of the motion. I should be able to deal with each of them in one sentence.

First of all, I would like to recall to honourable senators the objectives of the bill. This is a bill to implement tax treaties for the avoidance of double taxation with Malaysia, Spain, Liberia, Austria and Italy. Those treaties were signed, with regard to Malaysia, in Ottawa on October 15, 1976; with regard to Spain, in Ottawa on November 23, 1976; with regard to Liberia, in Ottawa on November 30, 1976; with regard to Austria, in Vienna on December 9, 1976; and with regard to Italy, in Toronto on November 17, 1977.

This bill is an exact copy of former Bill S-9. No changes have been made. Bill S-9 was approved by the Senate in standing committee on March 2, 1978, and received third reading on March 17, 1978. The reason we are asked to deal with this legislation again is that the other place had not dealt with it by the end of the last session.

Honourable senators, I respectfully suggest that, in the light of that background, second reading be given to this bill today, and that third reading be scheduled for the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, as the sponsor, Senator Frith, has said, we discussed this bill both in committee and in the chamber on both second and third readings, and it was passed by the Senate in the identical form in which it is now presented. I therefore see no reason why it should go again to committee, and I have no objection to any decision the Senate may make to give it second reading today.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Frith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 6:

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution, tabled in the Senate on Thursday, October 19, 1978.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I want to express my appreciation to those who have delayed their speeches in the Throne Speech debate to allow me to make the first presentation with respect to the first report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution of Canada. I feel it is important that we have the beginning of this debate as quickly as possible because of the other events which are going to be taking place rather quickly—the First Ministers' Conference; the report of the Pepin-Robarts Commission; and so on. I would like to be sure that we have from the Senate an input into the discussions which are going forward.

My first words, however, must be by way of tribute to my late friend and colleague, Joe Greene. I want to associate myself with the eloquent tributes which were paid to him last night by the Leader of the Government, the Acting Leader of the Opposition, and Senators Croll, Marchand, Graham, Frith, and Walker. I wish only to add that Senator Greene attended almost all the meetings of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution of Canada during the summer. His contribution was always made with perception, erudition, common sense and wit. By his participation, he made our hearings more interesting, knowledgeable and constructive.

Madam Speaker, while I am not speaking in the Throne Speech debate, I do want to take the opportunity of adding to those you have already heard my own expression of gratitude and congratulations for the never-failing courtesy and sensitivity with which you grace your office.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Stanbury: Your example is usually, but not always, followed in this chamber.

Honourable senators, since early summer a number of your colleagues have worked together on the study of Bill C-60 of the Third Session of the Thirtieth Parliament, a bill making extensive proposals concerning the Constitution of Canada. Last Thursday your committee tabled its first report. It was printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of that day. It is not my intention to review the report. You will do so at your own convenience.

However, I should like to make some remarks about the whole process of constitutional reform in which we are now engaged. We already have a great Constitution. I am liberal and I believe in reform. I am not a revolutionary, and I do not believe in turning everything topsy-turvy unless there is a clear advantage in doing so. When we find our Constitution wanting in some respect, we must take care in diagnosing the weakness and then take equal care in ensuring that the curative prescription is exactly of the right quality and administered in the right quantity.

All government and private bodies who have advanced proposals for constitutional reform have prescribed cures which are at least as likely to kill the patient as to cure him. They have taken too little care in their diagnosis of our weaknesses and have not considered the side effects their cures would have on the general workability of our parliamentary system.

The Constitution is, of course, only a tool to establish the basic rules by which we live together as Canadians. It defines jurisdiction and power, but only goodwill can ensure their reasonable exercise. It establishes institutions, but it cannot people them with wise and responsible incumbents. It lays down rights and duties, but it is the character and morality of the nation that will protect the individual.

A constitution should inspire those qualities in the population it is intended to guide. The British North America Act made no attempt to do so. It was, therefore, with great expectation that we looked at the preamble and statement of aims of Bill C-60. We were disappointed. The sentiments were there but the inspiration was missing. The prose will not lift the hearts and minds of the young who learn it. It will not challenge to excellence or compassion those who administer it.

The government has said many times that it intended only to codify the present role of the monarch, the Governor General, and the executive. Therefore, there should have been no controversy. However either naively or with intent, the draftsmen wrote in some important changes. The committee has limited itself to suggesting how the government's intention can be carried out.

In my opinion, we do need to strengthen the position of the Canadian Governor General. It is clear that the Queen is not going to exercise the royal powers in the event of a crisis in Canada. If she did, it would probably be the end of the monarchy. It is the Governor General who will have to act should a crisis arise, and he must have the power and prestige to do so. To give him that status we need not denigrate the present position of the Queen one iota. That is what I mean by a careful diagnosis of need, and an equally careful prescription of remedy.

There are those who say that the Supreme Court of Canada has some inadequacies. The committee found that they are almost all perceived rather than real. But that makes it no less important to deal with them. The appointment process already involves extensive consultation with the profession and the provinces, but consultation with the provinces should be more visible, so the structure and method of manning the court should be constitutionalized. But surely the attorneys-general are at least as competent and as visible, and as regionally oriented, as the second chamber for screening the character, philosophy and general suitability of those considered for appointment.

The fact that we have two different systems of private law does create some apparent problems for the court, but careful research shows that they also are apparent rather than real. So let us constitutionalize the present practice of the court in assigning judges to cases of mixed law. There is no point in changing the court and the system. Let us just make the fairness which now exists more visible, because that is the remedy which fits the ailment. The recent complaints of Saskatchewan are a case in point. The court simply interpreted the law. What Saskatchewan really has to seek is a negotiated change in the division of government powers and jurisdiction, not a change in the court.

The constitutionalizing of a charter of rights and freedoms is a good idea. Canadians do not now have consistent rights in every part of the country. If we can agree on a charter—and that will not be easy—and get it entrenched, it will allow Canadians to move back and forth across their country with greater assurance and certainty as to their rights. A wise prescription, with which the committee agrees.

The proposals we have seen so far for a reformed second chamber have all called for the replacement of the present Senate. The proponents are clearly saying that the Senate is not doing what is required of it, and that it is incapable of reform in a way that permits it to do so. If I were persuaded that that judgment of the present Senate is correct I would not want to remain a member of it. I am not so persuaded. I have the highest regard for individual senators, and for the work that is done by the chamber as a whole. That does not mean I think we are perfect individually or as a body. It may even be that, after careful diagnosis of our weaknesses, we will come to the conclusion that the method of election or appointment is so crucial to the future success of the Senate that a completely new structure is needed.

After ten years of observation, I think I understand why so many academics, columnists and politicians of other places have found the Senate to be such fair game for criticism, but I have never had the feeling that any of them has spoken with real knowledge of the Senate or understanding of its function. They have not taken care in their diagnosis, nor in their prescription for a cure.

There are several reasons for their criticism. The first is the process by which we are appointed. It may well be that the only full answer to that criticism would be direct election of the Senate. I confess that I was a little embarrassed when I was discussing Spain's proposed new constitution with Spanish parliamentarians in Madrid. They explained, with some regret, that they have not been able to get agreement on a completely democratic state. A proportion of their Senate is still to be appointed rather than elected. They asked me how we Canadian senators were elected. I tried, without much success, to explain why the Senate, in a federal parliamentary democracy as opposed to a unitary republican state, should be appointed. Thereafter, however, I sensed a certain loss of interest in my proffered advice on the structuring of a democratic state.

Our committee has pointed out that a reform of the Senate which would involve direct election could only be carried out with the concurrence of the House of Commons, and it was our feeling that that was unlikely to be forthcoming. However, that idea should not be abandoned if it commends itself to us as the most likely way to make real improvements.

If we cannot have an elected chamber, which in itself would have shortcomings—as is evident from the weaknesses of the House of Commons—then what kind of appointment selection process will give the Senate more credibility, enough credibility to allow it to gain the respect of the Canadian people as an effective parliamentary body carrying out the functions assigned to it?

So far all of the proposals focus on appointments by or on the nomination of provincial governments or parties. The reason is that everyone is searching for some way of ameliorating our interprovincial, interregional and federal-provincial problems. I hate to be the one to tell the Canadian people this, but provincial appointments to the Senate are not going to solve those problems. If the right formula is found, they may help, but too much is being expected of that simple expedient. Even after there has been a happy re-arrangement of the powers and jurisdictions of the governments, there will continue to be tensions between strong politicians elected at different levels. It is natural, and perhaps even creative, for them to play to their own audiences, each demanding of the other more than they know the other can give; and each demanding of the federal authority, for their constituents, some concession they know to be impossible in the overall national interest. But they are certainly not going to delegate that process to a second chamber, and no second chamber, no matter how constructed, can play more than a supporting role in easing those tensions.

Even if the Senate were to be completely appointed by the provinces, there would be provincial governments who would be winners and losers on each issue. And the losers would always say, "Why should we listen to them? We're elected. They are appointed by all those other provinces who don't understand us or our problems." Because, indeed, where any one region or province stands alone in its crisis, it will still be dependent on the tolerance and understanding of the others and on their willingness to negotiate a fair settlement. A reformed Senate may well be able to be of greater help in dealing with these serious concerns, but it will never be able to solve them.

The manner of choosing the members of the second chamber is of vital importance to its future credibility. The present method has been found wanting although, in fact, it has produced many excellent senators. There are all sorts of reforms which might be suggested. A number have been proposed by provinces and professional bodies. Other countries have struggled with this problem in their own context. While their solutions may not be directly applicable to us, a study of them and the context in which they are required to perform may help us considerably. Our committee intends to proceed with a study of the proposals made and the experiences of others.

Another criticism with some legitimacy is that we have too much power and, having no popular political base, we are unable to exercise what we have. Our committee will try to assess what kind of power a second chamber needs in order to carry out its functions, and what methods it can use to draw public attention to the reasons for its actions.

There is concern that some senators are not sufficiently active in the work of the Senate. The blame for that is usually put on the lifelong term of our appointments and the resulting lack of accountability. The alternatives proposed would cost the second chamber its stability and its independence from party discipline. Perhaps we can find a way of building in a reasonable balance between stability and accountability, while encouraging a greater participation by the members in the kind of serious and constructive work in which the Senate is now engaged.

A parliamentary second chamber is expected to perform certain functions even in a unitary state. Acting as a regional forum is an extra function which is given to the second chamber in federal states. All of the attention has been on that function. But is the present Senate adequately performing its other functions of legislative review, investigation of larger national issues, acting as a check on the executive and bureaucracy, and supplementing the work of the Commons?

Our committee will look at whether those are the proper functions of a second chamber in a federal parliamentary democracy, whether there are additional functions which would be useful, and, whatever the function, whether the performance can be improved by changes in structure or practice.

There is one other area I would like us to explore. I believe that the Senate, as presently composed, will continue to exist for some time while the debate on constitutional reform goes forward. I see no reason why we should not, in the meantime, do everything we can to improve our performance on behalf of the Canadian people. Even this chamber, as presently composed, could institute some reforms which would make us more effective. I would suggest some internal reforms we might consider.

When senators reach the state of health where they are no longer able to be active in the work of the Senate, perhaps the same provisions should apply to them as are now in effect with respect to judges in a similar position. We could initiate legislation to so provide.

[Senator Stanbury.]

Should there be available to senators provisions similar to those available to judges, who decide to accept supernumerary status? We could initiate legislation to that effect.

We could initiate legislation to lower the retirement age of future senators.

We could, by resolution of the Senate, recommend to the Prime Minister that in future he should make appointments to the Senate, taking serious note of the need to maintain an effective working opposition in the Senate and of the desire of provincial premiers to have a greater influence on those appointments.

By our actions, we could show that the Senate intends to take its own responsibility forthrightly and visibly. When we feel that amendments to legislation are justified, perhaps we should make the amendments and then settle their terms by conference with the appropriate committee of the House of Commons. Our present method of making suggestions for amendments may have contributed to the public's puzzlement as to what the Senate does.

When we see real problems with a bill, and are unable to resolve our differences with the House of Commons, we could consider the possibility of rejecting the legislation on terms which would be the equivalent of a suspensive veto. We need not use all the power we have. We could use it only insofar as we need to use it to accomplish the purpose we seek on behalf of the people of Canada.

How can we improve our ability to act as a regional forum? We already have done a great deal which obviously has not been recognized. Our late great colleague, Senator Hervé Michaud, led our study of maritime rural problems. Senator Argue's committee has been very effective in the study of the beef and grain industries, and of the agricultural problems of the Indians in British Columbia. Senator Olson leads the work on the northern pipeline. We completely revamped the Maritime Code and we made a special study of the trade opportunities of the Pacific Rim.

One cannot attend the meetings of any Senate committee without realizing the extent to which senators express their concerns about, and insist on rectifying, situations where they see a negative impact of federal legislation on regional interests.

But that is obviously not enough. Perhaps we should consider establishing a new standing committee of the Senate—the Senate Standing Committee on the Regional Impact of Federal Legislation. Such a committee could examine legislation, maintain liaison with provincial legislatures, call witnesses, make recommendations, propose amendments and even initiate legislation where it determined that such actions were necessary to give voice to regional concerns.

None of these proposals requires any constitutional reform. Some require legislation, but such legislation, initiated by us, would be difficult for a government seeking reform to refuse. Most of them would require only a determination on our part to react to the present atmosphere of reform in the best way we can while we pursue, through our Special Committee on the Constitution, the more far-reaching answers concerning structural reforms.

May I take this opportunity of expressing the thanks of our committee to our legal counsel, Mr. Robert Cowling, to the Law Clerk of the Senate, Mr. Ray du Plessis, to the Committees Branch, the parliamentary library research team, my own secretary, Miss Anne Johnston, and to the witnesses who so generously gave their time and advice as concerned Canadians.

May I also thank my deputy chairman, the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, and other members of the committee and interested senators for their confidence and support.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Rizzuto, seconded by Senator Bird, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate and to share with you some of my views on the issues that face the Canadian people at this time, but before doing so I would like to associate myself with those senators who have expressed their sincere condolences to the family of the late Senator Joe Greene.

I first met Joe Greene in 1963 when he was a backbencher and I recall that the government would often call on him to talk out a private member's bill because of his eloquence as an orator. He also had a good sense of humour. I recall one day translating his name into Italian, Giuseppe Verdi, and he liked that very much and used it on many occasions. I, too, extend my sympathy and condolences to his family.

First, I congratulate Senator Rizzuto and Senator Bird, the mover and seconder of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is a distinct honour to have the privilege of opening the debate on such an important occasion. Senator Rizzuto is not only the first non-English, non-French Canadian to present such a motion, but he also has the distinction of being the first Italian-born Canadian to be appointed to the Senate.

I would also like to join the senators who have preceded me in their acknowledgement of the great contribution that our Speaker has made to this chamber, and the goodwill she has created in the process of receiving visiting dignitaries from other lands and through her travels on behalf of Canada. Her Honour discharges her responsibilities with dignified charm and in a manner which has endeared her not only to the members of the Senate but also to all those who come in contact with her.

In the Speech from the Throne, the government has set out the priorities to which it intends to address itself in the ensuing months. There are many areas covered by the Speech from the Throne on which one could speak at length, but I shall confine myself to two, namely, constitutional reform, as it pertains to the House of the Federation, and national unity.

I was pleased to serve on the special committee of the Senate which was established for the purpose of studying the proposed constitutional amendments contained in Bill C-60. It was, for me, an enriching experience to have the privilege of assisting and participating in the discussions which led to the finalization of the report tabled by our chairman, Senator Stanbury, in this chamber last Thursday evening. I benefited immensely from the views expressed in the course of the debate by so many learned and experienced senators, and from the testimony of the expert witnesses who appeared before the committee.

Because of time constraints, the report which the committee tabled does not go beyond consideration of the proposed amendments contained in Bill C-60, but the committee intends to do so in the months to come. However, the report does set out the basic principles which must be taken into account in the structure and function of a second chamber.

It is not my intention to repeat the contents of the report, but rather to expand upon them. In order to do so, I should like to enunciate the basic functions of the Senate. They are (a) the articulation of the interests of the regions and minority groups; (b) the revision and introduction of legislation; and (c) the investigative role, which this chamber has undertaken in several crucial areas in the past.

I have, honourable senators, come to the conclusion that the Senate should be an elected body. Appointment to membership might have been satisfactory in 1867, but it is definitely out of step with the principles of democracy in 1978. The provinces believe that the Senate does not articulate the interests of the regions, and in their proposals for reform they have addressed themselves almost exclusively to this function of the Senate. Some provinces, such as British Columbia, have advanced specific proposals, but these proposals do not appear to be endorsed by the other provinces. One of the criticisms of the Senate is the appointment practice. British Columbia's proposal does not change this practice; it merely transfers the prerogative of appointment from the federal to the provincial government.

Bill C-60 is a compromise between what the provinces would like to have and the extent to which the federal government is prepared to go to meet what the provinces want. In doing so, the government has proposed changing the name of the Senate to "the House of the Federation," and it proposes that 50 per cent of the members of the House of the Federation be selected by the provincial legislatures and 50 per cent by the House of Commons on a proportional basis. Thus, Bill C-60 introduces a new element in Canadian politics, proportional representation.

In theory, proportional representation is the most equitable way in which to allocate seats in any chamber in a country where there is an homogenous society, but in practice, for Canada, it could have unfortunate consequences. I believe that having introduced proportional representation in the upper chamber, there would be pressure to extend the same principle to the House of Commons. Taking into consideration the vastness of our country, the regional differences and the ethnic diversity of our people, I foresee the possibility of the eventual proliferation of political parties that would lead to excessive fragmentation and, possibly, chronic minority governments. One might look to the Italian political situation for a comparison—in Italy there are some 15 political parties—and to get a glimpse of the endless negotiations involved in forming a coalition government of significant duration.

Just think how tempting it would be to have one's own member of Parliament articulate one's views on behalf of a special interest group. Would proportional representation give rise to regional parties which would be devoid of a national perspective? Would political parties emerge with an ethnic membership? Would proportional representation weaken national parties which are already handicapped by only token representation in certain regions? Of course, these are hypothetical questions, but there is an inherent danger for Canada in proportional representation at a time when we are still struggling with basic unity issues.

There is, honourable senators, under our present political system, ample opportunity for political parties, whose prime objective is to keep Canada united and strong, to articulate and formulate policies which take into account the various needs and aspirations of Canadians. The sudden and intense debate on Senate reform, accompanied by different proposals for such reform, has created the impression that the Senate is the main stumbling block to regional harmony. Furthermore, expectations have been created which may never be realized and which are likely to affect other institutions. The Senate report makes eloquent reference to this fact. Canadians are, I believe, small "c" conservatives. They prefer to proceed cautiously with changes to institutions and, generally, to adopt changes which have proved workable in the past.

What changes need to be made at this time, as a start, to ensure valid articulation of regional interests in the upper chamber? Would the establishment of periodic open conferences between members of the Senate from one region and representatives of the provincial legislatures of the same region ensure greater understanding of regional concerns? Would such a forum accomplish this goal? Would senators advocate regional interests, and would they be perceived to do so in their respective regions? Would this lead to the eventual replacement of the present undemocratic practice of federal-provincial conferences, where decisions are made in secret behind closed doors? Would an elected Senate be the only way in which the institution would be regarded as being truly representative?

Some Canadians believe that an elected Senate could claim equal status with the House of Commons, which might put the two houses in an adversary position, both claiming to speak for Canada. Others say that if senators were to concern themselves with re-election they would not likely develop the expertise which is so vital to the revision of legislation. Would it not be possible to overcome the first concern by establishing terms of reference delineating the areas of jurisdiction of both houses, similar to those of the Bundesrat?

Can the second concern be overcome by election to office for a specific number of years—six, as in the United States Senate, or longer, with one-third of the membership being re-elected every two years to ensure continuity?

I have put forth these views on an elected Senate in the hope that they will generate debate, and so allow Canadians to have a proper perspective of the structure of the second chamber. It is not, however, necessary to await overall constitutional reform to effect changes to our institutions, such as some proposed in the 1972 report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution. I am confident that, as was pointed out by Senator Stanbury, the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution will address itself to this and other matters in the months to come.

On the subject of national unity, I read an editorial in the Toronto Star of October 21, 1978, entitled "Ominous trends for Canada." Reading that editorial sent chills down my spine. It makes reference to the reception in Edmonton accorded Claude Ryan, the leader of the main opposition within Quebec to the separatist movement, for making a few opening remarks in French to express the linguistic duality of Canada's people. By contrast, the editorial went on to describe the standing ovation feminist Laura Sabia received from Toronto's Empire Club of Canada for demanding an end to "appeasement" of Quebec.

While luncheon and dinner audiences are not really representative of public opinion, it seems to me that during the last six months there has been a prevalence of negative news reaching the eyes and ears of English-speaking Canadians about French Canada. This period is reminiscent of the summer of 1976 when there was a pilot's strike over bilingualism in the skies. I do not recall ever reading so many venomous anti-French letters to the editor as I did at that time. It was disheartening. Not until November 15 of the same year did the mood in English Canada change.

For the first time in our generation Canadians came face to face with the serious consequences of the issue of national unity when Quebecers gave an overwhelming mandate to René Lévesque, an avowed separatist. Following that period, the negative voices receded and the majority of Canadians then came forward voicing a conciliatory disposition toward French Canadians. Quebecers perceived this feeling of understanding, a feeling which manifested itself in the polls taken later in Quebec showing remarkably little support for separation. This news allayed the concerns of Canadians about national unity, after which Canadians turned their attention to the economy.

It was last spring, at a Blue Jays game, that baseball fans booed the singing of the French version of O Canada, and that seemed to bring us back to the mood of the summer of 1976.

Is our understanding of national unity so superficial that we need to be constantly on the verge of breaking up in order to realize that our problem is a complex one, and one that requires more than just sporadic understanding? In the light of the Edmonton and Toronto incidents, are Quebec separatists telling their people that English Canada will not accept any confederation arrangements in which the majority does not continue to dominate the French minority in all matters of national importance—economic, political and social? Will Quebecers see no future in English Canada? Will they turn to the separatists for the fulfilment of their cultural aspirations and feelings of equality?

Ms. Sabia decried “hyphenated” Canadians. Are we taking such a mere, simplified view of Canadian society that the elimination of the word “hyphenated” would remove all ethnic differences? Does it mean that with a magic stroke of the pen there would no longer be native Canadians; that there would no longer be Canadians of Greek, Italian or Polish origin? Would the 4,500,000 Canadians who speak only French be happy to enroll in night school to learn English so that they could feel that they are Canadians? Would we all be one happy family?

The elimination of the word “hyphenated” would have the effect of putting all these different ethnic ingredients into a grinder from which instant look-alike, unhyphenated Canadians would exit on the other side? Is this the kind of bland society we want?

Laura Sabia is reported to have said that her first language is French. I am surprised she did not also say that she speaks some Italian, the language of her ancestors. I hope she is not embarrassed to admit that. The likes of Ms. Sabia do not believe in a pluralistic or multicultural society, where a person is accepted for what he or she is, not for what others would like him or her to be. After the French, I wonder which minority group is next.

After 5,000 years of written history mankind has not been able to overcome the basic instincts which drive him to distrust and destroy that which is different. We still live in a world plagued with racial and religious strife. Just take a look at the trouble spots of the world. We have an opportunity in Canada to rise above racial and religious animosity. It is not an easy task; it requires tolerance, goodwill, a great deal of understanding, and, above all, recognition and acceptance of our differences.

It has been said that a society can be judged by how it treats its minorities. What kind of society are we going to bequeath to our children? I hope it will be one a little better than the one we inherited. Professor Northrop Fry said:

A mature society tolerates dissent and rejoices in a variety of outlook and tradition.

One might argue that the solution to our problems is assimilation, but the facts prove otherwise. One need only look to the United States which is discovering the value of its pluralistic society. I hope that Canadians will continue to debate the kind of society we should have, because I have confidence in the outcome of the debate as I have in the future of this country, Canada.

DISRUPTION IN SERVICE—STATEMENT

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I stated earlier this afternoon, I was awaiting a further report on the Post Office situation. I now have that report and, with leave, I should like to bring it to the attention of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: As of 1 o'clock this afternoon, 34 per cent of the workers are back on the job.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: The announcement which was made yesterday was to remind all Post Office employees of the existence of Article XXVII of the Public Service Employment Act. It is the view of the minister responsible for the Post Office that CUPW leaders had not informed the workers that they were in danger of losing their jobs. And so the government has proceeded to remind them of Article XXVII of the P.S.E. Act. In this way employees now know that their jobs may be at hazard as of 12.01 tomorrow morning.

However, the minister responsible for the Post Office has given the assurance that all cases will be reviewed on merit. In other words, if there are cases where there has been demonstrable intimidation, then it would be completely unfair to say to those workers, “You are now among the ranks of the unemployed.” The minister has stated that he appreciates that of those workers who want to go to work, some have not done so because of this intimidation. Loyal workers who are prevented from going to work will not be penalized—that is to say, law-abiding, honest members will not be penalized—but Article XXVII will otherwise be applied resolutely. Each area will report on individual cases before the Deputy Postmaster General reports to the Public Service Commission.

Senator Grosart: I wonder whether the Leader of the Government would be good enough to be a little more explicit as to the purport of Article XXVII. My understanding is that it refers only to absenteeism for a period of one week.

Senator Perrault: Seven days.

Senator Grosart: Yes, seven days, and, therefore, it is not specifically related to the larger question of disobedience to the law of the land. Perhaps the Leader of the Government would indicate, if this is so, why this peril that the workers would be in was not drawn to their attention by the government earlier? I have followed the dispute fairly carefully, and as far as I know this is the first time it has been mentioned that seven days' absence would place the workers automatically in jeopardy of their jobs. It seems strange, as the Leader of the Government has said, that this was not drawn to their attention before they decided to accept the advice or direction to disobey the law.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government believes that a one-week absence from the job could constitute abandonment of one's occupation with the Post Office. As I said earlier, however, every effort has been made to meet this problem in a conciliatory and fair-minded way. The appointment of a mediator is an example of the government's initiative in this respect. The potential impact of Article XXVII has always been known to the leaders of CUPW, but the government now feels a special responsibility to bring its meaning and implications specifically to the attention of the workers so that they may know the hazard involved in prolonging their absence from work.

If honourable senators care for further amplification of the point, I will direct some inquiries to the minister responsible for the Post Office, and I shall bring to his attention some of the questions that the honourable senator has asked.

Senator Grosart: I thank the Leader of the Government for that. I think such a course will be very useful because, considering the situation, I think it is apparent to all honourable senators that the time has come to look ahead. This is probably the first time that there has been massive disobedience to the law of the land as expressed by the Parliament of Canada. There was concern on the part of many people that we were close to a state of anarchy, particularly when one leading member of the union was quoted as saying, "We have defied Parliament, so who is going to worry about the courts?" This was as clear a statement of anarchy as you can get.

However, I think it is important that this matter should be clarified because we seem to be in the situation where some of the workers have now decided to go back to work. They may have engaged in perfectly legal absenteeism because there was nothing illegal about being absent, even though they were in danger of losing their jobs. They are not, however, going back to work because they have been persuaded they should obey the law of the land. This to me would seem to be a very important aspect of the case. Is it only the question of the loss of dollars that has sent them back? Is there no question of their understanding the importance of obeying the law of the land?

I raise this question now because I think it is important that we look at the various channels open to Parliament and to the government to avoid this kind of thing happening again. The leaders of this particular union have made it clear that they have no intention even now of obeying the law of the land.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a further clarification will be sought, and I think it may well be in the interest of all honourable senators to have a daily report of the situation in the form of a statement by the leader in the normal course of events, if that idea has appeal.

There is no question at all but that the leaders of the union seem to have counselled defiance, not only of Parliament but of the courts, and in the final analysis they have no hope of winning that kind of battle. We do not want innocent victims to suffer in the process.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I wish to ask a question of the Leader of the Government following the clarification sought by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition.

Does he know that the union strategy could be to ask a certain percentage of employees to go back to work for 24 or 48 hours and then ask them to leave; after that, ask another group of employees to do the same thing?

Should this happen, would the Deputy Postmaster General or the Postmaster General be obliged to give a new notice of dismissal to their employees?

● (1520)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is expected that certain counter tactics may be considered by the leaders of the union, but, as I have stated, the government is studying further actions. In the final analysis no leader of that trade union, no Canadian citizen regardless of his occupation or his position, may with impunity defy the Parliament of Canada and the courts of Canada. It will not be permitted.

Senator Asselin: I do not mean that, no.

The Senate resumed from earlier this day consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Rizzuto, seconded by Senator Bird, for an Address in reply thereto.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, may I be allowed to add my expression of deep sympathy to that offered yesterday by my colleagues on the occasion of the death of our colleague, Senator Joe Greene. His judgment, his bilingualism, his capacity to readily understand our problems, his compassion towards everyone, makes us deeply feel his loss.

First, I would like to congratulate His Excellency the Governor General and Mrs. Léger for the outstanding way in which they carried out their duties as representatives of the Queen. As he indicated in the Speech from the Throne, His Excellency will soon be leaving. It will be with deep regret that we will see them both retire, though they deserve it well.

I congratulate our attractive Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, for her excellent work among us. It is also with regret that we will see our Speaker complete her well-filled mandate. Her kindness, her graciousness and her devotion on every occasion, has strongly impressed us. We will be deeply grateful and better friends when she resumes her seat as a senator with us.

Our leader, the Honourable Ray Perrault, and the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Jacques Flynn, have both discharged remarkably well their respective duties with propriety and great dignity for which we are grateful and we congratulate them.

I have been quite impressed by the statement on our economy that the government leader made last week. I did appreciate the hope and optimism that it reflected. I hope that he will forgive me if I point out a few sore points which in my opinion should be corrected.

We have heard excellent comments on the Speech from the Throne made by Senators Rizzuto and Bird, and some senators who spoke before I did, especially the speech delivered this afternoon by Senator Bosa stating quite interesting views which should be further considered.

Senator Walker chose a quite different tone to make his comments when he severely criticized the government and its ministers, directing a slashing personal attack against the Prime Minister, making him responsible for all the evils that plague our country, our economy, and national unity. Although I have a high regard for him as a member and as a friend, I do not agree at all with our colleague, particularly in light of difficulties and statistics the world over. The economic difficulties now affecting us should be considered on a world scale and we ought to refrain from chastising any one person or group in any given country.

Unless I am mistaken, the economic statistics establishing the position of Canada among the nations of the world as quoted a few days ago by the government leader in the Senate were not challenged. We accepted them and there was nothing pessimistic about them. Of course, everything is not always rosy everywhere. I, for one, would rather deal with the optimistic and realistic aspects of the Speech from the Throne. I shall make my own criticism about what should be corrected in our economy. I think that aspect always exists, no matter the government in power or the events of the moment. Considering the economic and political factors, I think it is wise to adopt the point of view taken by the government in the Speech from the Throne. Again for our benefit the government stresses current priority subjects, namely, of the need to shore up national unity and the Canadian economy.

In the Speech from the Throne which opened the Fourth Session of the Thirtieth Parliament, some people see a lack of seriousness, the scarcity of new pieces of legislation to help our shaken and threatened economy. Others criticize the lack of measures designed to cut taxes and to further promote home building. In light of the facts, such suggestions seem to me ill-advised. In my view it is desirable to call to the attention of our nation and its Parliament, as the Speech does, our national priorities, the strengthening of national unity and the Canadian economy.

We will shortly be called upon to make a political appraisal which will be fraught with consequences. The stakes are high. It concerns the strengthening of our national unity and the development of a more stable economy on which depends not only our prosperity as a nation but our basic survival as a federation.

I believe that the federal government has already picked the issues for the 1979 federal election, as it should have done, by recognizing that spending cuts and national unity were actually our top priorities at present. That explains, I believe, why this Speech was so unconventional in that it shied away from the usual practice of listing with fanfare a series of unrelated measures.

I am happy to note—and I hope that my interpretation is correct—a broader outlook as regards the constitutional reforms proposed in the bill on the Constitution. The recommendations of the House and Senate committees on the Constitution will have a major role to play in this evaluation.

I shall refrain from commenting further at this time on the reforms to our national Constitution. I shall do so at a later date and at greater length.

I am not one of those who criticize the Speech from the Throne saying it proposes no worthwhile projects. May I, honourable senators, remind you of what the Speech from the Throne does propose to our consideration?

First, a Youth Employment Corps program that will finance employment and training programs for our youth.

Second, a proposal to provide additional encouragement to industrial development.

Third, new constitutional amendment proposals to be debated.

Fourth, proposals for the careful and in-depth evaluation of the programs prepared and implemented by public servants.

Fifth, a review of family allowances programs with a view to providing more for those in greater need of assistance.

Sixth, a bill to adjust compensation in the public sector to that in the private sector, and to put a ceiling on public service pensions.

Seventh, a bill to transform the federal postal services into a crown corporation.

Eighth, a bill to create the office of federal ombudsman.

Ninth, a bill to reduce by $580 million the unemployment insurance program, the money to be used to finance a job creation program.

Finally, bills to remedy the abuse of work stoppage in the public sector.

Parliament will be working full time throughout the present session. To increase our workload still, I believe we should try to review during this session our federal legislation relating to public protection and security, particularly with regard to the transportation, siting, stocking and disposal of volatile and inflammable products, especially following the disasters caused by such products throughout the world in the last few months. Bill S-3, an Act to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers, is only the beginning of adequate security measures that have become necessary and urgent. It is reported that the explosive power of liquid gas, after it has been compressed to 300 or 400 atmospheres, is increased accordingly. A mere shock or rough handling can cause the death of a great number of people as well as extensive property damage. I believe our present legislation does not protect the public and property adequately. I think it is now urgent to review our legislation relating to security.

● (1530)

[English]

Federal government expenditures, as a percentage of the GNP, according to the last available figures of 1976, if we exclude transfer payments to provinces, amounted to 15.8 per cent, an increase of 0.5 per cent over 1961; while the percentage for the provincial and municipal governments, including transfers from the federal government, was 24.5 per cent, an increase of 9 per cent over 1961.

It seems to me that a way must be found to ensure more restraint in spending on the part of the worst Canadian spenders, namely, the provincial and municipal governments—and, I might add, the school boards.

It must be pointed out that the federal public debts now amount to approximately 22.1 per cent of the GNP, and our payments to certain agencies and crown corporations are over 25 per cent of the GNP. With the indexing of a part of the annual statutory expenses, it will contribute further to our federal economic problems.

While I am in full accord with the federal government's goals to put more restraint on federal expenses whenever possible, I realize that it will not be possible in the case of most of our statutory expenses, or for our interest payments on the public debts. These offer no such possibilities.

Possible relief appears to me to be in ensuring a rapid improvement in the national economy so as to provide an increase in the GNP and greater government revenue, which would result in a favourable solution to the economic problems of our nation. This would also contribute to the re-establishment of the dollar to a better international position, and appreciably diminish not only the federal deficit but our present unemployment.

I submit that there should be an immediate review of our national policy with regard to helping other nations of the world, whether they be third world countries, with the object of helping them in their need, or industrialized countries, with the object of helping the world economy and, we hope, our own international trade. I question our present ability to contribute to either group, as we have been doing, when we are quite unable to bring about the realization of certain important projects at home that would generate work for the unemployed and avoid major national crises.

I do not believe it has been very realistic on our part to move Canadian capital outside this country with the intention of helping other nations, though this may be a good thing for them, or of promoting international commerce. Nor do I believe that we are doing the right thing when we forgive or write off, for whatever reason, debts that are owed us by other nations, as we have been doing. I do not believe in the wisdom of the decisions of the government with regard to investing scarce Canadian capital in projects in far away countries, such as we appear to have been doing recently in Thailand, especially when we know beforehand that we will have to wait many years for even a possibility of obtaining some sort of return. These loans, of course, are made at rates of interest far below what we are required to pay on our own borrowings. Indeed, more likely than the acquisition of any return on our investment is the expectation that we will forgive the debt itself, as has been happening frequently in similar cases.

I challenge the suggestion that such measures are constructive, and good for our national economy at this time, and I challenge particularly the wisdom of adopting such policies without discussing them openly, and approving them, in both houses of Parliament. I am deeply concerned that such grants, gifts or loans, which have so often turned out to be bad debts, can be made by Canada without being first evaluated, analyzed and processed by both the House of Commons and the Senate and their committees. I am concerned that at a time of grave economic difficulty, the writing-off of millions and millions of dollars in foreign debts is allowed in this country without the study and approval of both houses.

I believe Canadian interests would be better served, and our national economy have a better chance to improve, if we could so change our policies that they would at least take our present economic instability into more careful consideration. It is time to review, reassess and redirect our policies, since they are likely to seriously affect and alter our present and our future. I question whether it was good advice from our economic advisers over these last few years to give a free ride to 54 per cent of all manufactured imports while our own exports kept falling off, because this weakened our national economy and drained our supply of needed capital.

I can only rejoice that there will, during the present session, be studies and analyses by a number of task forces composed of business people and other experts, the object of which will be to improve our national economic policies and reinforce Canadian unity. I take this opportunity to congratulate the government for having formed 23 federal task forces—I believe that number is correct—composed of some of the best authorities in Canadian business, finance and labour, who have proven themselves by their achievements in the different fields of our national economy. I believe these federal task forces will contribute greatly to finding the best means of creating the strong economy that we need so much. It is my understanding that the reports of many of these task forces are now in, and that the recommendations they contain are constructive and should go far towards re-establishing the Canadian economy in a strong position.

Increased government spending, increased Public Service demands, the mammoth inflation of the last few years—which has continued to exist despite our desperate attempts to fight it—the 85-cent dollar, record unemployment, the huge shortage of capital in the country, and the huge borrowings to finance our huge deficits, have all had their effect on our nation. I believe that if there are some Canadian statistics that merit praise—and I believe the leader stated them last week—there are others that call for severe criticism from us.

I believe we must at last realize that, as far as we are concerned, there is a price to pay for everything, and we are paying it, and that, as Mr. Henderson, our former Auditor General points out, at the level of $48 billion of spending a year, takes 50 cents out of every dollar's worth of goods and services being generated in Canada. The Government of the United States spends only 23 cents of its GNP dollar, and the claim there is that it is still much too high for the good health of their national economy. The near totality of these expenses there, as in Canada, did not generate anything constructive and good. The money spent was almost totally unproductive.

Yes, the government is right in spotlighting the two great priorities of the present—the reinforcement of national unity and the reinforcement of the national economy. They are our urgent concern. Parliament has now the opportunity to do something about them. May it succeed, while it can, with the help of all in both houses.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, as I rise to participate in the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I would like first to congratulate the mover and the seconder on their excellent speeches. They have given us food for thought, and they have sold themselves well in this chamber.

I should also like to welcome you back, Madam Speaker, to your chair of high esteem in this chamber, and to tell you that you not only bring honour to us senators, but you bring honour to the Parliament of Canada, not only within our own nation, but internationally.

Honourable senators, I would like, at this time to pay a tribute to one of our retired senators, the Honourable Alan A. Macnaughton, who has had long experience in the field of law, politics and business. He is a loyal and dedicated Canadian who has won honour and distinction in many fields, but I mention him especially today because of his relationship to Prince Edward Island.

During the early history of Prince Edward Island, in the latter part of the nineteenth century, a pirate ship from the United States entered Charlottetown harbour and plundered the city. One of the things they took with them was the mace from the Legislative Assembly. The Legislative Assembly of Prince Edward Island operated without a mace until 1965 when the Honourable Alan A. Macnaughton, then Speaker of the House of Commons, presented the second mace to the Legislature of Prince Edward Island in that historic chamber where the Fathers of Confederation met in 1864 to discuss the formation of this country. Alan Macnaughton's experience in law, politics, international affairs, finance and commerce will be missed in this chamber, but he will always be remembered in Prince Edward Island.

I should also like at this time to extend my sympathy to the wife and family of the late Senator John James Greene, better known as "Joe," who passed away so suddenly a few days ago. Senator Greene will be missed by his many friends and relatives as well as by his colleagues here in the Senate. He was a great lawyer and a great politician. He served as Minister of Agriculture and Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in the federal cabinet. He served in World War II from 1941 to 1945 as a flight lieutenant, was awarded the D.F.C. and was mentioned in despatches. However, he will probably be remembered most for the excellent and dynamic speech he made in 1968 when he contested the leadership of the Liberal Party and became known as the "Abe Lincoln", of Canada. We in the Senate are much richer for having had Senator Greene with us for a short time, and will be much poorer because of his passing. To his wife and family I extend my deepest sympathy.

I take this opportunity to welcome the many new senators who have joined us since the opening of the Third Session of the Thirtieth Parliament, and who have already shown their wide experience and knowledge of the government and affairs of our country. I believe the members of the Senate, both in the past and in the present, have been and are men and women of honour and distinction and experience in their many fields, and that it would be difficult to replace this group with any other group, whether they be members of the Senate, members of the House of the Provinces, members of the House of the Federation, or members of an upper house of the Parliament of Canada of any other name. I wish the new senators many years to carry out their duties in representing not only their regions, but all Canadians as they give sober, second thought to the many pieces of legislation that come before them.

Honourable senators, I was surprised to read in the first paragraph of the Speech proroguing the Third Session of the Thirtieth Parliament, delivered by the Honourable Ronald Martland, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada and Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, on October 10, 1978, that Her Majesty had visited Prince Edward Island. I was also surprised to learn that reference to her visit to Newfoundland had been omitted from the speech. Obviously, this is a typographical error and should be amended in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate to read:

The Third Session of the Thirtieth Parliament was opened by Her Majesty the Queen on October 18, 1977. Since then Canadians in many regions have been honoured by visits from several members of the Royal Family and Her Majesty visited Newfoundland and Saskatchewan as well as Edmonton, where she opened the Eleventh Commonwealth Games.

Although Her Majesty did not visit Prince Edward Island, I assure honourable senators that we watched her visit to Newfoundland, Saskatchewan and Edmonton, where she opened the Commonwealth Games, with much interest. Our love for and loyalty to Her Majesty, and to all members of the royal family, is of great importance to us. In this regard, I am more than pleased to read in the Speech from the Throne that the government wishes to make its position clear once again as to the role of the Monarch and the Governor General.

I was pleased to read that the government's view was, and remains, that the new Constitution should describe the situation as it exists today in Canada, and that the government is pleased that the provincial premiers expressed the same view during their meeting in Regina. I am further pleased to read that discussions are already in progress with provincial governments to ensure that the legal drafting conforms to that intention, and that the government reiterates that there is no intention to change or to reduce in any way the role Her Majesty plays.

This statement relieves a lot of fears among Canadians. Many of our citizens have brought to my attention the fact that they were of the opinion that Bill C-60 was going to reduce the role of the monarchy in Canada, and this was troubling them greatly. So, if the Speech from the Throne did no more than reassure Canadians that the role of the monarchy will not be altered, then I believe that that alone would give them further confidence in this government. I hope that the leaders of the other three major political parties in Canada will, during their speeches in the other place, reaffirm their support of Her Majesty, and reassure Canadians that, regardless of who should form the next government of Canada, the role of Her Majesty will not be diminished.

I was pleased also to note in the Speech from the Throne that the government is prepared to begin the study of the distribution of powers with the provinces at the same time as that of institutions and rights, and to give every aspect of the work of amending the Constitution a high and urgent priority.

If I could give the Government of Canada the feeling of most Prince Edward Islanders, I would inform the government and the members of the Senate that Prince Edward Islanders want to make sure that we have a strong central government, and are not asking to have the rights of the provinces broadened or extended. It is the belief of most Islanders that unless we have a strong central government the quality of life in the smaller provinces and the outer regions of this country cannot be equalized so that every child, regardless of where it is born in this country, will have an equal right to an education, to social benefits, to free hospitalization and free medical care, and an equal opportunity to full employment and a decent standard of living.

I maintain, honourable senators, that if we weaken the role of our central government just to please the wishes of some of the provinces, we will destroy what we have built up since Confederation by our national programs of health care, social programs, unemployment insurance programs and highway programs such as the trans-Canada highway, and we will tend to balkanize this country, with some very rich provinces and some very poor Canadians.

I was also pleased to note in the Speech from the Throne that the guaranteed income supplement for our senior citizens will be increased, which confirms what was announced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on August 24, 1978, when she proposed an increase of $20 per month to each household receiving the guaranteed income supplement. The increase will be added to the January 1979 cheques, and will be considered part of the regular indexed guaranteed income supplement payment thereafter.

The guaranteed income supplement is currently received by about 1.2 million Canadians, and is intended to supplement the old age security payments of those who have little or no income. The basic old age security rate for all Canadians over 65 years of age is now $164.74 per month, and the maximum guaranteed income supplement rate is currently at $112.08 per month for single individuals, and $199.04 per month for couples.

In all, about 55 per cent of the income of Canadians over 65 years of age comes from publicly financed pensions, and over half of Canada's elderly population rely on the guaranteed income supplement to augment their income. The minister pointed out in August that where the guaranteed income supplement payment was being provided to a couple, the total increase would be $20 per month, the same as for a single recipient. She indicated that this was intended to ensure the best possible distribution of benefits, with a larger relative increase being provided to the single elderly. This feature is intended particularly to correct the situation whereby single pensioners are relatively worse off than married pensioners.

The changes proposed in the system of family allowances and the new refundable tax credit are intended to provide money to help Canada's working poor. Here the objective is to ensure both that the 1.5 million children who currently live in poor families receive a better start in life, and that middle income families are assisted in providing for their children. At the same time, it is intended to provide a stimulus to the Canadian economy by directing tax deductions to those people who will spend the money on basic Canadian-produced goods and services, such as food and shelter. The minister pointed out in August that this type of program design is now possible because experience with many of our social programs, gained over the last several years, has taught governments how to ensure that more of the money goes where it is needed.

The minister emphasized that this refundable credit will provide full benefits even to families who do not pay income tax. The basic amount of the refundable tax credit is $200 per year for each child under the age of 18. As a family's income rises above $18,000, the amount of the tax credit will be reduced by $5 for every $100 in earnings. Thus, a one-child family would receive a $200 credit at an income of $18,000, or a $100 credit at an income of $20,000, and would cease to receive the credit when family income rises above $22,000. In the case of a three-child family, the corresponding figures would be a $600 credit at incomes up to $18,000, a $500 credit at an income of $20,000, a $400 credit at an income of $22,000, and the family would cease to receive the benefits of the tax credit when its earnings passed $30,000.

In all, more than 2.4 million families with more than five million children will receive this benefit. The biggest benefit will go to those large, low-income families which need it most, and over $300 million will go directly to Canadian families below the Statistics Canada poverty line.

There will be a major change in the family allowances program. In January 1979, monthly payments in respect of each child will be $20 instead of the $25.60. The rate of $20 will be indexed in succeeding years as are current payments. This reduction, which will achieve a cost saving of $690 million in 1979-80, is intended to preserve the good points of the family allowances program, while permitting the savings to be used for the more sharply targetted refundable tax credit.

The reason I spend some time talking about this program is that many Islanders, and probably many Canadians, do not understand the benefits that they are going to receive from this new child tax credit program. It has been pointed out by some mothers that they could not understand why their family allowance cheque would be cut in January from $25.68 to $20 per month, as suggested in the new program. But they will be pleased when they learn that if they are making less than $18,000 per year, they will receive a $200 tax credit for each child under the age of 18, and families that do not pay income tax will receive a cash rebate of $200 per child. Since this program becomes effective in the 1978 taxation year, a mother of four children whose income is not high enough to pay income tax, should receive a cheque for $800 at the end of April 1979, as her share of the $200 tax credit for each child. This $800 cheque would allow the mother to buy something worthwhile for her children, which she could not do with the $5.68 on her monthly cheque under the present system. I believe that most mothers, especially those in the low income bracket, will much appreciate this tax credit or this cash rebate of $200 per child when she better understands the program and receives her first cheque. In all, I believe 2.4 million Canadian families will benefit from the $800 million tax cut under this new family allowances program.

These changes imply no net increase in social policy expenditures. They represent a realignment of social policies in the direction of providing more money where it is needed most. They are in line with proposals which were made for social policy changes following the social security review of 1973-76. This money will go to those Canadians most likely to provide a direct stimulus to the economy by spending it on the necessities of life, and least likely to put it into savings for the purchase of luxury or foreign goods. It will thus act both to stimulate the Canadian economy and to improve the situation of lower-income Canadians. It will help ensure that those hurt most by inflation and those least able to cope with economic problems receive the assistance they need.

Honourable senators, I note in the Speech from the Throne that we will be asked to enact legislation to make the Post Office a crown corporation, with a view to making postal services more efficient and responsive to public needs. If this means that by making the Post Office a crown corporation we will not have any more postal strikes, then I am for it. But, personally, I do not believe that by making the Post Office a crown corporation we will benefit the citizens of Canada by improving the efficiency of the service to any great extent. I believe the time has come when we, as Canadians, have to look at the Public Service and wonder if we did the right thing when we gave its members the right to strike. When we consider the wages paid to the many postal workers, and at the same time consider that nearly a million Canadians would be pleased to have those jobs, perhaps we should ask those workers if they are using their right to strike wisely and for the betterment of this country—especially at this time when unemployment is so high, inflation is difficult to control, the Canadian dollar is on the downgrade, our productivity is not as great as that of some of the other industrialized countries, our exports are not as high as they could be, and our imports are probably greater than they should be.

Should we not ask these Canadians to consider their fellow Canadians who are not as fortunate and who are unemployed, or, if employed, whose income is not as great as their own, before they shut down the services and tend to destroy the efforts of other Canadians to make the economy of this country grow, and thus give full employment and better the wages of all Canadians? If they are not prepared to consider their fellow men, to use their right to strike with more discretion and to curb their demands in line with other Canadians, then I believe that we, as parliamentarians, may have put too much trust in them in the first place when we gave them the right to strike. Perhaps we should have guaranteed them compulsory arbitration instead of giving them the right to strike. At any rate, I hope that the making of the Post Office a crown corporation will reduce the number of strikes and give better mail service to all Canadians.

Honourable senators, this question of the strike by the inside workers in the Post Office brings to mind Bill C-8, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code, which was passed by Parliament during the last session. Because there was the possibility of a federal election being called, it did not receive the study by a committee of the Senate that most people thought it should have. Having this in mind, I remember quite clearly that the Leader of the Government in the Senate gave a commitment to this house. The commitment, which can be found at page 633 of Debates of the Senate of Thursday, April 13, 1978, is as follows:

I want to give this commitment to the house. I shall undertake the appropriate initiative in the near future to have the subject of labour relations in the federal sector referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. I certainly hope that all groups not heard on the subject of Bill C-8, and indeed many of those who have been heard if the committee should so decide, would appear before that committee to state their views—indeed to state ways in which they think the Labour Code of Canada should be changed at some future date.

Honourable senators, you may be aware that while the Senate is primarily a legislative body, it also exercises two other modern functions—a deliberative function and an investigative function. Under the Rules of the Senate, a senator may at any time call the attention of the Senate to a particular matter for the purpose of having that matter considered or examined by the Senate. Upon consideration of a subject matter brought to its attention in this way, the Senate may, on a motion to that effect, refer the subject matter to a special or standing committee for more in-depth examination, at which time witnesses may be called to appear before the committee and submissions may be heard. There are numerous examples in the past where the report of a committee that has examined a particular subject has been followed sooner or later by remedial government legislation. I believe it was this procedure that the Leader of the Government in the Senate had in mind when he made the statement in the Senate last April.

It is my view that the subject matter of labour relations should be referred to a special committee of the Senate, or to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. A committee of the Senate should study the Canada Labour Code as it affects labour relations in the federal sector, and I would like to remind the Leader of the Government of his commitment. I believe that when this is done both government and labour will have an opportunity to appear as witnesses, and the committee can make some strong recommendations for better employer-employee relations in the Government of Canada for the future. It is my belief that both the Government of Canada and the Public Service would have an opportunity to air their views, and perhaps the Senate could perform a great investigative function and make some strong recommendations to the Government of Canada for remedial legislation.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE

DISRUPTION IN SERVICE—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have some information regarding the postal situation which may be of interest. The latest reports indicate that a large number of inside postal workers have reported for work today. I understand the general figure is 80 per cent. There are, however, one or two spots of difficulty. Further reports are expected shortly, and there may be improvements in those areas as well. Toronto South Central and London, Ontario, seem to be areas where the return to work by the employees has not been as great as in some other places in the nation.

There have been reports about legal action against certain of the union leadership. The government takes the view that the vast majority of CUPW members are responsible, law-abiding citizens who wanted to resume work. However, as some honourable senators suggested yesterday and on earlier occasions, in some instances there have been fears of union reprisals. The government is aware of the situation.

There appears to be a minority radical group of no more than 10 per cent which appears to be in control and a larger group which follows the union. These groups are larger in the major centres. As far as union leadership is concerned, warrants to authorize a co-ordinated search of certain CUPW offices across the country were exercised yesterday at 3 o'clock Ottawa time. Later in the afternoon the Minister of Justice announced that criminal charges under section 115 of the Criminal Code had been laid in the Ontario Supreme Court in Ottawa against CUPW President Jean-Claude Parrot and four colleagues. They are expected to appear in court today.

Section 115 of the Criminal Code reads as follows:

115. Every one who, without lawful excuse, contravenes an Act of the Parliament of Canada by wilfully doing anything that it forbids or by wilfully omitting to do anything that it requires to be done is, unless some penalty or punishment is expressly provided by law, guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

So action is proceeding in this area.

Certain honourable senators asked yesterday about those employees who in fact did not report for shift this morning and who were not available for work after 12.01 this morning. These employees are now in the position where they can be declared to be no longer employees of the Post Office Department. However, every case will be reviewed individually by the department to make certain that before any action is taken it is determined whether certain employees are absent wilfully or whether they are prevented from working because of coercion or intimidation.

Section 27 of the Public Service Employment Act reads as follows:

27. An employee who is absent from duty for a period of one week or more, otherwise than for reasons over which, in the opinion of the deputy head, the employee has no control or otherwise than as authorized or provided for by or under the authority of an Act of Parliament, may by an appropriate instrument in writing to the Commission be declared by the deputy head to have abandoned the position he occupied, and thereupon the employee ceases to be an employee.

This is the operative section as it may be applied, and undoubtedly will be applied, to certain employees of the Post Office Department who are not on the job at the present time.

Senator Manning asked yesterday whether the government has considered decertifying the union. It can be said that this is now on the list of possibilities, but it is extremely unlikely that the government will take such action.

Yesterday, Honourable Senator Walker asked whether there appeared to be any communist involvement. I understand there have been widespread media reports today suggesting that the government has launched a widespread investigation of alleged communism in the Post Office Department. I want to clarify the situation. When I heard Senator Walker's question, I stated that an inquiry would be made. I did not suggest an inquiry on communism in the Post Office would be made. I said I would inquire of the minister responsible for the Post Office whether he had any information on this particular point. That is the nature of the inquiry which we intend to make.

Senator Marchand: Would the Honourable Leader of the Government clarify a point for me, please? I believe he has said that it is not at this moment the intention of the government to decertify the union. Is that an official decision or is the matter still open to discussion? I wish to state emphatically that I am violently opposed to any kind of decertification.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the report provided to me states that, while this is on the list of possibilities, it is extremely unlikely that the government will take such action.

DIRECTIVES TO WORKERS BY UNION LEADERS—QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, in listening carefully to the statement by the Leader of the Government on the Post Office situation, I did not hear any reference to the reports in the press that the union itself, that is, the headquarters of the union, had advised the Post Office workers, the members of the union, to return to work. Perhaps the leader made that statement and I simply did not hear it. But it does raise a question as to what advice or direction has been given to the workers. Have they been told to return to work and to obey the law or have they been told merely to come back so that they can avoid the effect of section 27 of the Public Service Employees Act?

Senator Perrault: I am not able to report any further information at this time. I expect to talk to the minister responsible for the Post Office within the next half hour, and I know that that question has already been placed before him.

Senator Grosart: Could the Senate be assured that, if possible, the Leader of the Government will make a statement on that specific point, because at the moment the crux of the matter seems to be whether the employees have been directed to obey the law or merely to avoid the effect of absenteeism of seven days or more.

GREAT LAKES SHIPPING

EFFECT OF SHIPPING CONTINUATION ACT—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government amplify the response he gave to my question about Great Lakes shipping with respect to whether everything is back to normal? Has any action been taken by any of the companies to keep their ships idle for the balance of the shipping season, or has that problem been alleviated?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no further information on that point as yet. I hope we will have further information shortly. An effort will be made to obtain that information before we rise this afternoon. Indeed, I am advised by our colleague Senator Langlois, who is a distinguished expert in maritime law, that the engineers reported for work yesterday at noon.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Frith moved the third reading of Bill S-2, to implement an agreement between Canada and Malaysia and conventions between Canada and Spain, Canada and Liberia, Canada and Austria and Canada and Italy for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Rizzuto, seconded by Senator Bird, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I take this opportunity to participate in the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Throne Speech, because it gives me an opportunity to pay my respects, first, to our illustrious and distinguished Speaker, Madam Lapointe, and to wish her continued health during her term of appointment, however much longer that might be.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Marshall: If, indeed, the duration of her appointment is short, I hope that in whatever capacity she may find herself she will continue to enjoy health and happiness.

May I also take the opportunity to extend my deepest respect to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, Jules Léger, and to express, along with all honourable senators, my appreciation for the graciousness with which he, together with Mrs. Léger, has honoured Canada during his term of office, and most particularly for his determination to continue in that prestigious office as our first Canadian despite adversity in health.

May I also congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion, Senators Rizzuto and Bird, and compliment them on their speeches, which I read with keen interest.

I also express to the Prime Minister of Canada my sincere appreciation for my appointment to this chamber, despite my political leanings. I only hope that I can fulfil his confidence in me in whatever contribution I can make to our proceedings during what may turn out to be a period of months to come rather than years to come. I am honoured more so to be appointed as one of an ethnic minority, and in this regard I am pleased to join such renowned Jewish colleagues as Senators Croll, Austin, Buckwold and Goldenberg.

More particularly, may I take this opportunity to express my deepest appreciation to all honourable senators for accepting me in this chamber and for their sincere comradeship. I hope that I can contribute in some small way to assist them in the widespread responsibility which they carry but which, unfortunately, for some reason or other, does not seem to be recognized in many circles across our nation.

If I may be allowed, I think it is fitting that I pay tribute to my predecessor, Senator Mike Basha, who represented that district of the province of Newfoundland which I now have the honour to represent. I should like to pay tribute also to his wife and family. May I thank also my Newfoundland colleagues, Senators Rowe, Cook, Petten and Lewis, who, despite our different political loyalties, have accepted me with a sense of particular Newfoundland comradeship which I am sure all you other Canadian senators envy.

Finally, may I place on the record my compliments to my leader in the other place, Joe Clark, to my leader in this chamber, Senator Flynn, and to my party colleagues who, if I may use a hockey term, "drafted" me into their fold, along with Senators Roblin and Wagner. The members of the official opposition can certainly use our presence, in numbers if not in quality, in discharging their responsibilities in both the Senate chamber and in committee.

May I express also my appreciation to all my colleagues in the other place, and particularly to the Honourable Don Jamieson, who has inspired so much pride in his contribution to Canada, which has reached down to Newfoundland.

Honourable senators, I indicated that the work of the Senate is not recognized. May I ask you to bear with me when I express the trepidation I feel at the realization that so little is known across Canada about just what the Senate does, or what a senator does, despite the responsibilities that we hold. For me, in the light of what I myself have learned in my few short months in this chamber, and despite my 10 years as a member of Parliament, this is alarming, to say the least.

I am sure that the reaction in my own district to my appointment is common right across Canada, and it has already led me to the conclusion that there is a serious misconception on the part of the majority of Canadians of the important role played by the Senate as a part of the Parliament of Canada. That role was designated by the Fathers of Confederation, who decided that in the structure of Parliament there should be a Senate, the purpose of which would be to ensure the protection of citizens' rights and freedoms, to protect the individual, and to ensure that legislation passed in the other place would be in the best interests of individual Canadians, regardless of their status.

May I say, honourable senators, that although I received many tributes and accolades from my province of Newfoundland, and from across the country, on my appointment to this chamber, I became very concerned when I learned that the general feeling was that I would not continue to be able to serve those citizens that I had represented with the greatest encouragement and support since 1958. My concern has been intensified by the fact that for some reason or other the message has been disseminated over the years that this chamber is a haven for retired party supporters, a place for political patronage, a prestigious home for older politicians. I say to you, honourable senators, with the greatest respect, that you have allowed this to happen without a fight, without reaction, mainly because you have been too honourable and statesmanlike to try to overcome this misconception, that has been allowed to continue and become exacerbated over the years.

I have had some research done to support my rebuttal of some of the myths that exist not only among Canadians generally, but also among the so-called experts who, to my mind and with the greatest respect, are ignorant of the facts. I had this research carried out because it is obvious to me that the government that proposed the amendments to the Constitution must feel, for reason beyond my powers of imagination, that there is something wrong with our system of government in that Canadians are either not receiving proper representation or that the legislation which is intended for the benefit of Canadians has in fact not been to their benefit. If that is the reasoning, all I can do is ask how they could come to the conclusion that it was the fault of the Senate.

Most of the legislation that is drafted by the government for the benefit of our country originates in the House of Commons, is debated there by the government party and all three opposition parties, and is then passed by a majority of that house in conformity with Canada's system of democracy. The next step in the democratic process is the review of the legislation by the Senate, which gives the legislation a sober second thought and vetoes it if it is bad—and certainly there have been plenty of examples of that over the years. Unfortunately, instead of allowing this chamber time to ensure that the legislation is beneficial to Canadians of whatever status, the legislation often comes here under demand, or under duress or threat, that it be given royal assent—in most cases against our better judgment—within set time limits. So instead of using common sense to correct the defects in the legislative process where those defects originate, namely, in the House of Commons, the draftsmen of the amendments to the Constitution have made the Senate the scapegoat. The solution could have been very simple. All they had to do was simply and logically, and with some fundamental common sense and reason—and it could have been done in one paragraph—given us the same power of veto which it is proposed in Bill C-60 to give to the House of the Federation. Turning to my research paper to support this portion of my argument, I should like to quote from a statement by the Father of Confederation, Sir John A. Macdonald:

There would be no use of an upper house if it did not exercise, when it thought proper, the right of opposing—or amending—or postponing the legislation of the lower house.

I ask the question: Has the government allowed us this right? Sir John A. went on to say:

It must be an independent house, having a free action of its own.

I ask the question: Have we been allowed to exercise that free action? Sir John A. concluded by saying:

It, the upper house, is only valuable as a regulating body, to consider legislation and to prevent any hasty or ill-considered legislation which may come from that body, but it will never set itself in opposition against the deliberate and understood wishes of the people.

Perhaps, honourable senators, this might be an over-simplification of reality, but, in defence of past governments, the Fathers of Confederation could not have foreseen the developing realities and the demands caused by changing conditions. For example, since 1935, with the exception of an interruption between 1957 and 1963, the Liberals have been in power, and that has resulted in a preponderance of appointments to the Senate from that party. My short experience has made it obvious and clear to me that those same Liberal senators, when given the opportunity, have carried out their duty and responsibility to ensure that legislation is properly examined. Notwithstanding that, there is no reason to believe that this matter could not be corrected by simply expanding the existing consultative process agreed to by the government with the opposition parties, to ensure a reasonable proportion of opposition senators in the future.

I now move along to rebut what I consider to be another myth, and that is the misconception about the age and qualifications of senators compared with members of the House of Commons. Keeping in mind that by law a senator must be at least 30 years of age, that there are 264 seats in the House of Commons and only 104 seats in the Senate, I offer two statistics to illustrate my point. Eighty-one members of the House of Commons are from 50 to 59 years of age, representing 33 per cent of the total membership of that house. Thirty-one senators are in the same age bracket, representing 33 per cent of the total membership of this house. In other words, the percentage of membership in this age bracket is exactly the same in both houses. While in recent years the average age of MPs entering the political field has become younger, the same rule applies to the acceptable fact that the age limit of senators has been lowered. If this is the case, there is no reason to blame those senators who were appointed, either originally for life or, as it is now, to age 75.

It is hypocritical to presume, nor has it been proven, that a citizen is less capable of assessing what is beneficial to his country at whatever age, commensurate with the legislative experience he holds or has gained over the years.

While I cannot deny the admiration I have for my former colleagues in the House of Commons, and their devotion to the cause, it is certainly hypocritical for those who claim expertise to distort the devotion, dedication and experience of senators merely because they are appointed rather than elected.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Marshall: I put the question to those self-declared expert critics who ask for abolition of the Senate or an elected Senate, and ask them when they will look at reality and use some basic common sense for a change.

Let me give a few more statistics. In a 1978 comparison of MPs and senators with legislative experience, from 1867, MPs with legislative experience declined from 48 per cent to 10 per cent up until 1962.

Let us look at the present status, in 1978. The one striking statistic is that 73 per cent of MPs had no previous legislative experience, while only 49 per cent of senators fell into that category. An increasingly smaller proportion of MPs, both cabinet and backbenchers, have held public office prior to their election to Parliament. Indeed, fewer MPs today have had the experience of being a candidate, let alone winning a public office before their election to Parliament. But senators have held some of the most important public offices in the land: 28 per cent have been MPs; 24 per cent have had provincial legislature experience, and 8 per cent have served in provincial cabinets. At present we have 6 ex-provincial premiers and 7 leaders of provincial political parties who have sat in opposition. My research report concludes that senators possess a wealth of political experience when compared with MPs.

May I impose on you, too, to review a breakdown of Senate experience as extracted in 1977 in reply to a question by Senator Austin. We have the valuable municipal, provincial and federal cross-governmental experience of 7 former aldermen, 8 former mayors, 14 federal cabinet ministers, 14 provincial cabinet ministers, 7 provincial leaders of opposition, 8 provincial leaders of political parties, 25 former members of the House of Commons, 18 former members of provincial legislatures, 6 former parliamentary secretaries and 6 former premiers.

Besides having served in public office, senators have also gained valuable political experience in party office. Sixty-five per cent of the senators interviewed had held party offices at some level. Indeed, 32 per cent of the senators had been members of their party's national executive. Senators have been presidents of their national parties and have headed national election campaigns. These figures are impressive when compared with those pertaining to legislators in other western systems. In the United Kingdom, only 21 per cent of Conservative and Labour candidates for the House of Commons had ever held a party office, and only 9 per cent of U.S. Congressmen have reported holding positions in their party's national executive. The report concludes:

Again Canadian senators prove to be among the most politically experienced legislators in the world.

A concluding point can be made about the amount of experience senators and MPs have in their present office. Naturally it takes a senator some time to learn the ropes in the upper house and to acquire the necessary standing and skills to have a real impact on his colleagues and on legislation. According to one professor's sample, between 1965, when the compulsory retirement at 75 became law, and 1971, the average tenure of senators dropped by almost one-half from 16 years to 8.32 years. This compares favourably with the corresponding statistic for MPs, who have an average tenure in office of 7.23 years.

The great difficulty in drawing conclusions about the Canadian Senate, the report went on to say, is the lack of an underlying consensus over its raison d'être, and the following comments are therefore drawn only in part from the analysis, with various conclusions being based on what the author found.

Many of the Senate's critics start with the assumption that as Canada is a democracy the Senate must therefore be a democratic institution. This immediately calls into question the method by which senators are summoned to office, and leads to the inevitable call for an elected Senate. This, many of the more perceptive critics note, will cause serious difficulties for the parliamentary system. The essential problem concerns how the executive, the cabinet, can be "responsible" to two separately elected houses. This conundrum has yet to be solved, so the critics then ask for the abolition of the Senate. This is a rather simplified version of the argument, but it is logically consistent if one accepts the underlying premise.

However, one can also argue that a non-elected Senate, especially one that acts in a positive and circumscribed way, and by long tradition does not seek to thwart the popular will, may well be consistent with democratic government. One expert argues:

It surely does not follow that every institution of government must itself be directly elected in order to conform to democratic principles. The crucial condition is that those elected to lead the nation should have the last word.

The Canadian and British monarchy, the British House of Lords, the American cabinet are all non-elective institutions which serve democratic governments and serve them well. In this light, the value of a non-elective Senate is more a matter of how it works and what it accomplishes. To evaluate it from this perspective is still difficult, because again there is no one consistent set of expectations against which its performance can be measured—and I say to you, honourable senators, that you have done this proudly over the years.

If one accepts the intentions of the founding fathers and looks upon the Senate as a house of review for the exercise of "sober second thought," then its current composition can be seen to reflect this aim. It is composed of mature persons who have achieved a measure of success in a previous career. Most have had a career in business or one of the professions, and many are experienced legislators. In contrast, a good many of the younger members of the house are in the early or middle stages of their careers. Those who do not stay within the legislative process—many are retired by the public but many retire of their own accord—use their legislative experience as a step on the ladder of their own social and professional mobility. It is, therefore, to be expected that senators will be older than their counterparts in the House of Commons. It would require a fundamental change in the nature of Senate membership to have this age substantially reduced. Nevertheless, it will decrease to some extent as those members appointed before 1966 eventually retire. But I say, as I have said previously, to my mind nobody can prove to me that age has anything to do with serving your country.

The tenure of senators compares favourably with that of members of Parliament, so the turnover rate in both houses is about the same. This means that the Senate is certainly not lacking in new personnel, and one might expect new ideas and changing perspectives.

In terms of education and occupational background, senators and members of the House of Commons are very much alike. Each represents a very select group of citizens who are much better educated than the population as a whole, and who come from higher status jobs. These are the words of the authors of this report, not mine. In a sense, both groups are "achievers". Members of the House of Commons have had both occupational and electoral success, whereas senators are chosen from among a rather select list of "successful" people, and this selection process, as one professor points out, is not without its own element of competition.

In general, senators and members of the House of Commons have rather more in common than they have differences. The differences which exist appear to be based upon the Senate's role as the "senior" house of review. The "role" of each house, it can be argued, complements the other in the service of Canadian democracy.

So I quarrel with those experts who somehow, somewhere, and without justifiable support, state that the Senate should be an elected body. I ask those experts, who supposedly know what is right for the people of Canada, why devoted Canadians, in order to serve Canada—a service to which they have dedicated their lives—have to be elected rather than appointed to perform that same service.

Does a Canadian such as my deskmate, Senator Smith, who had the confidence of the citizens of Nova Scotia as an elected representative for many years, have to be elected to continue to serve in this house as he did as premier of Nova Scotia? Or does a Canadian such as Senator Roblin, an elected Premier of Manitoba for ten years, have to be denied the opportunity to continue to serve Canadians with his wealth of experience because he was not elected but appointed to this chamber?

Do Canadians with legislative or other experience, who are members of the party I am happy to represent, have to disqualify themselves from continuing to serve their country in this honourable chamber?

Does a citizen such as Senator Hicks, the president of a great university, a leader of a party, have to be elected, or should he be denied the opportunity to contribute to the educational needs of our country?

Do persons of the capability of Senators Forsey, Connolly, Hayden, and many others too numerous to mention, with their expertise in finance and legislation, which is so helpful to the Parliament of Canada, and who are experts on the Constitution which we have been debating for the past few months, have to disqualify themselves from continuing to serve their country?

Should persons of the calibre of Senators Bell, Bird, Anderson, Neiman, Inman and Norrie, who have devoted years of their lives to women's rights, be denied the opportunity to continue that service to our nation? Should many others in the labour field, the business field and the municipal field be denied that right? Should the many other senators in this chamber, whom I have failed to mention but whose attributes are well known, also be denied continuing their devotion to their country?

I want to turn to another aspect of my assessment of the work of the Senate, namely, Senate procedures. While MPs have complained for years—and I did while I was a member of the other house—about their lack of recognition and inability to make a contribution on behalf of their constituents, and while various committees in the House of Commons battle in frustration to overcome that lack of recognition, the solution to their problem rests right here in the Senate procedures on Orders of the Day. While MPs battle on a day-to-day basis to get recognized in the daily 45-minute question period, our procedure imposes no time limit on the question period, and gives each and every one of us unlimited opportunity to question the Leader of the Government on Canadian issues.

While MPs are frustrated in their lack of recognition to debate motions under Standing Order 43, and while private members' bills worthy of consideration die without debate, even though introduced in the interests of Canadians their sponsors serve, our Senate procedure gives each and every one of us the simple opportunity to give 48 hours' notice of any proposal we wish to make, with unlimited time to develop that proposal on behalf of Canadians.

Fortunately, honourable senators, there are some clear-thinking experts in the country, including the news media, who appreciate the value of the Senate. While there were many examples given by Senator Stanbury and others yesterday to support that value, I should like to put on the record one example to project the value of the Senate in respect of its investigative role. I quote from an editorial in the Calgary Herald of October 16, as follows:

The federal government's Constitutional proposals tend to underestimate the value of various aspects of the existing governmental apparatus, especially the Senate.

So it comes as something of a surprise when the usefulness of the investigative function of that body is re-emphasized, as it has been by a report of the Senate's National Finance Committee.

For a mere $79,000, which covered two years of investigation of the federal government office accommodation program, the committee has produced 62 recommendations for trimming waste and extravagance, which it is estimated could save millions of tax dollars annually.

Although the committee is dominated by Liberals, it was not sparing in criticism of government policies which led to waste, as exemplified in lease-purchase deals for government offices in the Hull-Ottawa area.

The committee did its job under a considerable limitation in that it is not empowered to see Treasury Board and other documents.

Much more is made of the Senate's weaknesses than its strengths, to the point where the federal government is now contemplating its replacement by something called the House of the Federation which, on paper at least, could have many more weaknesses than the Senate.

The tendency can be strong in politics, especially when a government knows it is failing, to look into the political system for the source of problems instead of at the people who make use of the system.

The latest work of the Senate Finance Committee is evidence that the present system isn't as bad as it is often made to seem if it is used effectively.

Finally, I wish to say a word or two about my very minor participation in the work of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution, a participation which was disturbed as a result of the by-election in my district. I take this opportunity to apologize for that interruption, and to congratulate those members of the committee who drafted its first report, which I have read with great interest.

However, honourable senators, with the greatest of respect, I should like to make two observations. The first is that I wonder why we are reluctant to fight for the Senate's continuance in its present form, with some amendments, for fear that we would be criticized for trying to save our own jobs, if we believe and know we are right. No one agrees more than I that a Constitution which served us for over 111 years must be amended from time to time in order to meet changing conditions and needs, but why change just for the sake of change without reason or justification, as is presently contemplated and proposed under Bill C-60?

My second observation follows from the first in that I detect a complex of inferiority that has set in, because if we fight for retention of the Senate in its present form it will give the impression that we are fighting for our personal survival. If we believe, each and every one of us, that we are serving Canadians and are dedicated to continue to serve, why should we not fight to overcome the misconception that pervades society about the value of the Senate? I intend to do so with conviction because I am proud of my appointment to this chamber.

I thank you for your attention.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): May I ask the honourable senator whether the reports to which he referred are reports which have been published and which can be identified, or whether they are the result of private research?

Senator Marshall: I had the Library of Parliament draw up a comparison between the Senate and the House of Commons. I have already instructed my secretary to send copies to all senators. This reminds me that I should take this opportunity to thank the staff of the Senate for their hard and dedicated work.

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, in rising to support the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, it is with a sense of pride and, at the same time, humility, that I do so. I wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion on the excellent quality of their speeches. As well, I want to compliment those honourable senators who have preceded me in this debate.

Also at this time, I wish to express my sincere gratitude to His Excellency the Right Honourable Jules Léger and Madam Léger for the unique contribution they have made to Canada during their term of office in Government House. I am sure that all parliamentarians and, indeed, all Canadians share the same feelings of respect and affection for this most distinguished and gracious couple who have so ably represented Her Majesty since 1974. Our prayers and our best wishes go with the Governor General and Madam Léger as they near the end of their term of office.

I would also be remiss if I did not join all other honourable senators in complimenting our gracious Speaker on the manner in which she has so capably carried out her duties and responsibilities with such charm and distinction.

I join all of those who have paid tribute to the late Senator Joe Greene, and convey to his family my sincere sympathy in their bereavement.

Reference has been made to the retirement of Senator Alan Macnaughton. I know he will be sorely missed in this chamber and in its councils, to which he has contributed so much. With his background of experience in national and international affairs, he could be one of a vanishing species in parliamentary affairs.

Honourable senators, as part of the parliamentary process, we have heard the Speech from the Throne in which the government outlined existing conditions, and the measures which it feels are in the interests of all Canadians and which it proposes to implement during the coming months. Today, I wish to deal briefly with a few of those pressing conditions facing Canada and, in particular, the impact they have on Nova Scotia and the Atlantic region in general.

I was somewhat taken by the opening paragraphs of the Throne Speech as they related to Canada's two most pressing needs—the strengthening of our economy and the renewal of our federation. Indeed, those two inseparable imperatives are different expressions of the same goal: to strengthen Canada through unity; to unify Canada through economic strength. I suggest that all Canadians must recognize that this is not an “either/or” situation. We must be concerned with both the economy and national unity. If we concentrate on one and fail to deal with the other, we shall achieve neither. It should be clearly recognized in any discussion of Canada's future economic performance that a divided country can only result in severe economic dislocation to all of Canada.

The Throne Speech points to the fact that we must set our economic goals, and identify efforts that can be made at national and provincial levels to achieve them. While some may wish to define these goals in terms of rates of growth in gross national product, or in terms of international trade, I believe that, in the final analysis, the true test is much simpler. The test of our achievement is whether we can provide a job opportunity for every man and woman who wishes to be gainfully employed.

Economic performance in Canada, while comparable with that of any other western country, is inadequate in relation to the achievement of society's goal of meaningful employment for all Canadians. People need work. They need it as an activity as well as a source of income. Unemployment benefits, however generous, do not make unemployment tolerable.

People need the sense of purpose, the sense of belonging to a community of interest that goes with a job. To meet this need must be a truly prime concern of any society. We do not minimize the difficulty of achieving our goals while our neighbouring trade partners are underperforming. Unfortunately, there is no way that any of us can insulate ourselves from the current economic problems of North America.

Of great concern to me, beyond the general employment picture, are the particular employment problems faced by our young people today. As a nation, we are losing wealth each day because we fail to utilize fully the vital potential of our youth. It is a needless waste that must not continue. I was, therefore, somewhat encouraged to see in the Throne Speech that special emphasis is to be placed on the training and job placement of young Canadians.

Honourable senators, I recall last February, when Canada's ten provincial premiers met with the Prime Minister in Ottawa to discuss economic matters, they identified a number of major labour-intensive initiatives, and went away with the hope that quick action would be achieved in developing this country's vast untapped hydro energy potential, and in revitalizing our national railway system, our shipbuilding, steelworks, coal mines, ports, and the fishing industry.

It was felt that an accelerated effort in such projects would go a long way toward putting Canada's surplus labour force to work building assets now that would serve this country well in coming decades. Regretfully, little has been accomplished to date in bringing any of these projects forward to the point where they are able to generate any significant level of employment. The problems of transforming resolve into actual jobs requires that Ottawa, together with the provinces, strives to achieve greater momentum in getting those 12 or more major projects in various regions of Canada off the ground in order that we may begin to realize real progress in the battle against unemployment, particularly in the slow-growth regions of this country.

Nova Scotia was to benefit from such major capital projects as a new coal mine at Donkin, Cape Breton; programs to maximize benefits from the new 200-mile fisheries zone; the extension of a natural gas pipeline from Cornwall, Ontario, to the maritimes; commencement of detailed site engineering work on a Fundy tidal power plant; and improvements to the national railway system. Activity to date on these proposals has generated little employment, although the potential of each is indeed labour-intensive.

I know that major projects such as these are tremendously expensive, and there is a limit to the resources of the federal treasury. However, I would suggest that Canada cannot afford to delay these projects at the cost of continued high unemployment. The waste of human resources and a listless economy is perhaps an even more expensive price to have to pay.

There is much talk about a transfer of funds from lower priority to higher priority goals. Surely the advancement of a number of these major projects will have the desired effect of promoting job creation, stimulating private sector growth and encouraging industrial innovation.

I was pleased to read in the Throne Speech that the government is committed to continued wage restraint in the public sector by ensuring that compensation in the federal public service remains in step with that in the private sector and does not lead the way.

[Senator Barrow.]

While I am on the subject of wages in the public service, I would like to state for the record—and I believe I speak for the majority of Nova Scotians in this respect—that I am utterly appalled at the attitude of those unions and their leaders in the public service who, apparently, have no regard for the inconvenience and hardship imposed on the long-suffering public. The past few months have seen a number of strikes in the public service at all levels of government across this country. Of national prominence were a series of strikes in Air Canada and, more recently, in the postal service. The public's tolerance level for strikes in both the public and private sectors has about reached the breaking point. Indeed, I believe it has now exceeded it.

Governments must take a very tough and firm stand against public service strikes, especially when they involve the disruption of federal, provincial and municipal services and programs designed to serve the needs or to protect the rights of taxpayers as a whole.

The fact remains that Canadians, by and large, are hard-working, ambitious people. Too many who desperately want to work are without jobs. With this in mind, it is very difficult to swallow such demands as 30-hour work weeks for 40 hours' pay, when we have thousands of Canadians walking the streets who would be only too happy to have the opportunity of putting in an honest 8-hour day, 40-hour week, for a decent level of pay. There is something very wrong if government does not clamp down hard and fast on the disruptive and needless militancy that is spreading within the public sector. Why should the hard-pressed taxpayer who is footing the bill for public service salaries have to carry the further burden of disruptive service, economic dislocation and, in some cases, bankruptcy brought about by strikes in the public service?

Honourable senators, may I say that I support in principle the government's commitment to expenditure restraint within its own ranks. Today it is extremely important that government be held accountable for its expenditures, and that it seriously attempt to make every tax dollar do more work, or at least provide full value.

However, in the process of cutting back programs with a minimum of difficulty, the government must not reduce budgets blindly or without proper consultation with provincial governments. Unfortunately, a classic example of what I speak of is illustrated in the proposed closure of the federal fisheries research laboratory in Halifax, which was mentioned by Senator Hicks last week. This action is simply unthinkable at a time when the east coast fishery is on the verge of a dynamic resurgence which will, if properly encouraged and nurtured, result in tremendous economic benefit not only to Atlantic Canada but to the nation as a whole.

The advent of the 200-mile offshore limit has placed the east coast fishery in the position of having the potential for doubling, and possibly tripling, its production over the next ten years. In order to achieve this potential, a great number of conditions have to be met, including extensive research into such aspects of the fishing industry as the harvesting and processing of non-traditional species, quality control of seafood, including food safety and contaminants, and the design of new fishing vessels and equipment.

The Halifax fisheries research laboratory is already a world leader in these areas of research, and is not, as some would suggest, a place where fish meal is made into flour for cookies. It must continue to provide the lead if Nova Scotia and Atlantic Canada are to develop the fishery for the maximum benefit of our people. A decision to close the fisheries research laboratory, or to cut back on its operations, is absolutely ludicrous, and should be reversed without further delay. Closing that laboratory at this point in time would be like going back 50 years to when Canadians were refused trawler licences and, as a result, had to watch the rape of our traditional fisheries by foreign powers.

Cutbacks in fisheries research, or any other activity related to the fishing industry, would be nothing less than a contradiction of the policy outlined by the government in the Throne Speech, not to mention the government's agreement last February during the First Ministers' Conference to adopt programs and measures that will maximize benefits from the new 200-mile fishing limit.

Honourable senators, the fishery is as vital a resource industry to Nova Scotia and Atlantic Canada as oil is to Alberta and potash is to Saskatchewan. But unlike those resources, the fishery is a renewable resource. Rather than thinking about expenditure restraints that can only harm the fishery, the government should be thinking in terms of offering incentives to the private sector to help Canada fully develop the fantastic potential of the fishery. In the same way that tax write-offs are given to oil exploration companies, perhaps a similar program could be applied to the east coast fishery. By offering incentives to private industry, government would greatly expedite development of this great natural resource.

I am told that in Nova Scotia alone the value of today's fishery is approximately $264 million. By 1987 the market value of fish and fish products produced in Nova Scotia could approach $1 billion annually in terms of today's dollar. The fishing industry presently employs about 11,000 fishermen directly, and, in addition, 4,500 plant workers. On top of that, there are 10,500 persons directly employed in the many support and supply industries related to the fishery. If the fishery is developed to its maximum potential, there would be another 10,000 jobs created in processing alone.

I would also point out that increased harvesting and processing activity will, in turn, present substantial opportunities for the manufacture of fisheries-related equipment and technology, which is bound to be followed by the development of a significant export industry. Of prime importance to Canada, in view of the fact that the bulk of our fish production is exported, is the gaining of valuable export dollars which will be no small contribution in assisting to overcome Canada's balance of payments deficit.

However, unless the harvesting, processing and marketing capability of the fishing industry is developed, coincident with replenishment of our stocks, the potential benefits from the resource will be unnecessarily deferred, and possibly lost in part to Canadians. It should be obvious that there is no bonanza to be had automatically from the establishment of the 200-mile limit. The new fishing limit will do nothing more than merely create a holding action in that industry unless the federal government, in concert with the provincial governments in Atlantic Canada, is prepared to make some solid commitments toward developing the east coast fishery. Such commitments are in the best interests of not only Atlantic Canada but of the nation as well.

I believe Nova Scotia, along with her sister Atlantic provinces, some months ago submitted a proposal to Ottawa which called for the replacement over a ten-year period of half the inshore fleet, and half the offshore trawler fleet. The 1977 dollar figure represents a capital investment in the order of $760 million to accomplish this. With the addition of $150 million for a starter program to replace the foreign fishing effort, the total investment will amount to some $910 million over the next decade.

Needless to say, this magnitude of activity would be an excellent beginning toward modernizing Canada's fishing fleet and helping to maximize our fishing potential, and it also underlies the tremendous opportunities that would accrue to the shipbuilding and ship-repairing industry in Nova Scotia and other maritime provinces.

Honourable senators, the Throne Speech makes the point that economic improvement alone will not guarantee a united country. While I agree with this statement, I would make the observation that the Canadian economy cannot perform that well without strong regional development. If we can attain a balanced economy throughout all regions of Canada, then our chances of staying united as one nation will be so much greater.

I have never been able to understand the argument that a strong central Canada will trickle worthwhile benefits to the slower growth areas such as the Atlantic region. I hold the view that stronger regional economies will produce in total a strong national economy. Prosperity in Quebec and the Atlantic region would mean improved markets for the manufacturing industries of Ontario, as well as a smaller drain on the federal treasury in terms of transfer payments.

Natural economic forces alone would never have created our nation, and they alone cannot sustain it. The economy remains too small, in relation to our geography, with the consequence that we limit ourselves too much to the industries that can prosper at the centre. The country as a whole cannot prosper unless we deliberately undertake national policies that moderate the centralizing tendency.

Provinces such as Nova Scotia must, therefore, support the existence of such an organization as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Our regret is that it is not more effective in bringing about closer attention to regional considerations within the programs of federal departments generally. DREE should have greater influence within the federal structure, and should be given a stronger direction and more financial resources.

A prime example is transportation policy. The principle of user-pay applied to railway transport is a denial of the whole basis of Confederation. If we were to try to operate our railways on the accounting principle that each service should pay for itself, then we would not have meaningful national development, and I fear that we would not very long have a nation.

In short, the need is not for national programs in some compartments and regional programs tacked on in some other and inevitably smaller compartments. We need national policies with adequate regional orientations. That is true of transportation, it is true of energy, it is true of trade negotiations, it is true of agriculture and of tourism, it is true of industrial strategy and it is true of fiscal policy. Recognition of this principle is crucial to any process of constitutional realignment on which Canada and the provinces embark together.

Canada's slow growth regions look to Ottawa to make its commitment to regional development both strong and profound; not simply spending money on regional programs, but conducting all-national programs so that they help to secure vigorous, balanced growth across our country.

Honourable senators, Canadians from coast to coast will be focusing their attention on Ottawa over the next few days as the first ministers meet to begin another round of discussion and negotiation on a new Constitution for Canada. The challenge is to build a new Constitution that will secure all of Canada better, overcome the grievances of not just Quebec but of all the provinces, establish more harmonious relations between the provinces and Ottawa, and assure the survival of the country we love. Above all, the one ingredient it has to have is fairness for all Canadians and unreasonable advantage for none.

I was pleased to see in the Throne Speech the government's statement that a common starting point for constitutional reform is the retention of the monarchy. This system has worked well for Canada, and the role of the monarchy must remain unchanged in any new constitutional structure.

I would only add that a comprehensive review is unlikely to be successful if arbitrary deadlines are imposed. A fixed and rigid timetable is unrealistic and does nothing to contribute to the harmony and goodwill necessary to complete a process of constitutional review, a process that will provide the basis for all Canadians to achieve a greater measure of economic and social wellbeing and cultural fulfillment, and to establish better relations among governments.

Honourable senators, in closing I would like to comment briefly on two or three transportation matters as they relate to Nova Scotia and the Atlantic region. It goes without saying that Canada must develop a national transportation policy which reflects regional needs and which, in fact, can be used as an effective vehicle for regional economic development. Successive governments have long recognized the need to reduce regional economic disparity and have, through legislative and other action, shown the important role that transportation plays in reducing such disparity. We in Atlantic Canada have long suffered the disadvantage of having to pay higher freight rates because of our geographic location in relation to the distance from large central Canadian markets. While we have come a long way, the problem of distance to our principal markets is still very much with us and must continue to be of national concern.

The past several months have seen a good start on the building of a second container facility for the port of Halifax. Upon completion, this facility will pay even further dividends to the national economy and add yet another exciting chapter to the success story of the port of Halifax and the vital role it plays as Canada's all-year gateway for import and export traffic.

The recent addition to the Halifax international airport has added tremendously to the region's economy, and further enhances the important role that the airport plays within the national context. While the airport improvements are welcome, the disparity in national air services continues to be a serious problem for both passenger and freight movement to central Canada and points beyond. The ability to move people and goods into, out of, and within, the Atlantic region is an essential social and economic need. In this regard, I am glad to support Senator Hicks and others who call for a national air carrier other than Air Canada. Another national air carrier is badly needed. It is to be hoped the Canadian Transport Commission will look favourably upon CP Air's application to serve Halifax. This would not only provide additional air service to Nova Scotia, but would also create some healthy competition for Air Canada and would, we hope, result in improved service into and out of the region by that carrier.

One could cite many examples of how Air Canada could improve air connections out of Halifax. One badly needed connection, for instance, is a year-round direct service to New York. At the present time there is only a summer service to New York on a direct flight basis, and the service to and from Boston in terms of service and facilities leaves something to be desired.

In addition to allowing CP Air access to Halifax, it would be helpful if Eastern Provincial Airways was given an expanded role within the Atlantic region as well as permission to operate a direct Halifax-Montreal service.

Another area of concern is the federal government's desire to have Nova Scotia share the cost of non-constitutional services of the Bay of Fundy ferries. These vessels provide a vital link in the movement of goods to important United States markets, not to mention the movement of passengers and tourists to and from Nova Scotia and the maritimes in general. The province simply cannot afford to share the cost of the operation of the Bay of Fundy ferry service to and from New England.

Honourable senators, I apologize for the length of my remarks. However, I had a number of points that I wanted to cover, and I thank you for bearing with me. These are difficult times for Canada and her people but, more important, they are exciting and challenging times which demand the best from all of us. If collectively we give our best, then Canada has a glorious opportunity to develop its great potential and become the envy of other nations.

The people of Nova Scotia are anxious and proud to participate, not as French, English or other ethnic groups but as Canadians, in the Canada that we all love so dearly.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Rowe, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 31, at 8 p.m.

THE HONOURABLE ALAN A. MACNAUGHTON, P.C.

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, with the retirement on July 30 of the Honourable Alan Macnaughton, the Senate lost one of its most able and distinguished members.

Alan Macnaughton is a supreme parliamentarian who in his 29 years in Parliament earned the respect of all parties in both houses. He is a gifted and brilliant lawyer who once stated that a person who had educational advantages should attempt to return to his country some of what that country had given him. Alan Macnaughton has done this tenfold. He has been dedicated to service in many fields—to Parliament, his community, his country and to his fellow man.

Alan Macnaughton was first elected to the House of Commons for the new constituency of Mount Royal in 1949 and re-elected in 1953, 1957, 1958, 1962 and 1963 and became Speaker of that house in May 1963. He never lost an election; a remarkable accomplishment for those who risk the hazards of political life and know something of the electoral shoals that await unwary politicians.

He was summoned to the Senate on July 8, 1966, and for more than ten years graced this chamber with his wisdom, his charm, his charity and his capacity for work.

The Honourable Senator Walker paid eloquent tribute to Senator Macnaughton in his speech last week in this chamber. In the course of that speech he gave a thorough account of Senator Macnaughton's distinguished career, one which, far from being at an end, has branched into a new and additional range of productive and constructive endeavours.

Together with others here, I benefited greatly from his advice. All of us regret the retirement from this chamber of a most distinguished and able gentleman. Truly, Senator Macnaughton is a man for all seasons.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I think we should thank Senator Walker for having drawn to the attention of the Senate the fact that Senator Macnaughton was compelled to retire in July last, having reached 75 years of age.

I got to know Senator Macnaughton in the House of Commons. He was especially noted as chairman of the Committee on Public Accounts where indeed he had to face the formidable David Walker. He managed very well, as Senator Walker himself pointed out last week.

He had a distinguished career in Parliament. He also had an outstanding career at the Bar and in business where his ability was recognized by being appointed director of many companies.

Senator Perrault pointed out the fact that he was never defeated in the Mount Royal constituency. I recognize that it has a special merit, but not necessarily for a Liberal in that riding. I would say that perhaps he was unfortunate enough to give up his seat to someone who has never been defeated since then, and of course I refer to the Right Honourable Prime Minister, Mr. Pierre Elliot Trudeau. It was the best seat available for someone who did not want to carry a tough fight if he was of course a Liberal candidate.

At any rate, I think it is appropriate to underline the career of Senator Macnaughton and recall his services to the country, the House of Commons, the Senate as well as the professional milieu of the Bar and the business world. I am sure he will continue to serve his country in other endeavours outside of active politics. He is a friend whom we hope to see again as often as possible.

[English]

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, Senator Macnaughton was my deskmate in this chamber for many years, and I should like to say just a few words about the contributions he made to the work of the Senate.

Alan Macnaughton was nearly 30 years in Parliament, as previous speakers have remarked, and that in itself is an exceptional record. In 1963 he was elected Speaker of the House of Commons, an office which none but the very good and very brave assume. However, I think we knew him best—at least I did—for his work in this chamber and, in particular, as Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Alan Macnaughton will be remembered as one of the very devoted members of the Senate. Certainly he had a feel for Parliament and a love of Parliament, and a great understanding of parliamentarians and their ways. He leaves us a legacy of effective work, and the memory of a fine lawyer, a distinguished parliamentarian, and a capable friendly man.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, November 1, 1978, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

GREAT LAKES SHIPPING

EFFECT OF SHIPPING CONTINUATION ACT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on October 25 a question was asked by Senator Olson with respect to the shipping dispute on the Great Lakes.

I am pleased to report that the striking marine engineers of the fleet returned to their ships as promptly as they possibly could following the enactment of the law making their strike illegal. The ships have been moving since last Wednesday and all are now back in service. The impact of the strike will be relatively minimal due to the quick intervention of the government and Parliament but, unfortunately, the production lost during those few days is unlikely to be made up during the balance of the season.

The demand on the shipping trade was already so great that there is no reserve capacity left that would make it possible to make up for the time lost. Only unusually good weather conditions towards the end of the season this coming December might achieve this. The Seaway has already extended its navigation season by four weeks since 1959 but cannot guarantee that ships still in transit on December 15, the official closing date this year, will exit the system. It cannot therefore add another week even though it would be in the public interest. This is why, as the departmental informants state so graphically, "Mother Nature will be the one to decide just how costly this strike has been."

GOVERNMENT PRICE AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA RESPECTING CRUDE OIL—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on October 25 a question was asked by Senator Olson with respect to the government price agreement with Alberta respecting crude oil.

The federal government has made a proposal to the Government of Alberta for a pause in the upward movement of oil prices. The Government of Alberta has taken this proposal under advisement and will presumably make its views known in due course.

The government's proposal as made last August was not a call for renegotiation of the June, 1977, understanding, but rather it was an appeal to Alberta and the other producing provinces to agree to a pause in the upward movement of oil prices having regard to the difficult national economic situation.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE—HOUSE OF THE FEDERATION— QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Does he have any information to give the Senate in connection with the discussions that took place this afternoon at the First Ministers' Conference regarding the proposed House of the Federation?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only state that I attended the very interesting meeting of first ministers this afternoon, and along with other honourable senators I was heartened by the considerable support expressed for the Senate by several of the first ministers from across this country.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

HOSPITAL SERVICES—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question about a telegram sent to the Minister of Veterans Affairs by the Northeast Veterans Association of Bathurst, New Brunswick. The association complains that while hospitals to serve veterans have been built in certain areas, none have been built in the northeast part of New Brunswick, and many veterans there find themselves without a hospital bed.

Perhaps the leader could seek an explanation from the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice. Information will be sought as soon as possible.

SAFE CONTAINERS CONVENTION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William J. Petten moved the second reading of Bill S-3, to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers.

He said: Honourable senators, the object of Bill S-3 is to provide enabling legislation for the implementation in Canada of the International Convention for Safe Containers. With one exception, this bill is identical to a previous bill that received third reading with the full support of all honourable senators in the last session. Paragraph (d) of subsection 3(1) has been added, expressly providing authority for regulations requiring the use of both official languages of Canada on the safety approval plates affixed to containers that have been safety approved under the jurisdiction of the Canadian government.

Honourable senators will recall that the convention was adopted by the 1972 Conference on International Container Traffic that was held jointly by the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe and the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization (IMCO), a special agency of the United Nations. A Canadian delegation participated in the development of this international convention and signed it, subject to its later ratification by Canada.

The convention came into force internationally on September 6, 1977, following ratification of the convention by 10 countries. Full compliance of the convention will be required by September 6, 1982, on which date contracting parties to the convention will initiate control measures to give effect to the convention.

When the previous bill was introduced there were 12 contracting parties to the international convention. Five additional countries have ratified the convention in the interim period, including the United States of America, the United Kingdom, Japan, India and Liberia.

The convention has not yet been ratified by Canada. Upon passage of Bill S-3, Canada will issue an instrument of ratification to the international organization. The convention will come into force in Canada one year later.

Honourable senators, Canada should ratify the convention for two reasons: first of all, adherence to the Container Safety Convention by Canada will provide the degree of safety required in the container industry and ensure uniform application of national laws concerning the safe usage of freight containers in international transport. Secondly, failure to do so can have the effect of disrupting the flow of Canadian containerized goods to and from the many countries which have ratified the convention and whose regulations can penalize and detain Canadian containers.

It might be helpful at this point to identify the main provisions embodied in Bill S-3. They are as follows:

1. Container owners will obtain safety approval for containers and thereby comply with minimum safety standards, and this will be noted on the container by a safety approval plate. A valid safety approval plate will constitute a safety "passport" facilitating the movement of a container internationally.

2. Newly manufactured containers will be tested in accordance with safety standards set out in annex 2 of the convention.

● (2020)

3. Containers in service at the time the convention comes into force in Canada will be safety approved if evidence is provided as to their safe usage over a two-year period or if they meet the criteria equivalent to that required for new container approval.

4. Container owners will carry out periodic inspection of their containers in accordance with approved procedures.

5. The owner of a container will be responsible for maintaining it in a safe condition. If there is evidence to believe that the condition of the container is such as to create a risk to safety, the owner will be required to take such container out of service until it has been restored to a safe condition.

6. The convention does not apply to containers specially designed for air transport covered under the Aeronautics Act. It does allow for additional safety requirements for containers specially designed for the transport of dangerous goods, or bulk liquids and for containers when carried by air.

The spirit of the draft regulations is the wish to achieve compliance with the convention with the minimum amount of industry regulation.

Extensive consultation has taken place with the container industry and, in addition, the provinces have been consulted and generally have no problem with the convention. It applies only to containers employed in international transport and no requirement has been revealed for similar regulation of standards for containers used domestically.

Honourable senators, it is proposed that safety certification of new and existing containers will be done by utilizing the organizations already providing classification standards in Canada for ship building and structural steel construction. I am speaking of such organizations as Lloyd's Register of Shipping, Bureau Veritas, and the American Bureau of Shipping.

Actual compliance with the convention will be checked at strategic entrance and exit locations across the country by employing such personnel as customs inspectors, coast guard surveyors, and Canadian Transport Commission rail inspectors as part of normal duties and within existing resources.

In closing, honourable senators, I should like to stress that the Canadian container industry has a fine safety record, and the international convention will ensure that this standard will be maintained. Canadian ratification of the convention will reinforce world safety standards, and it will ensure that Canadian containerized goods will have an orderly flow to the many countries who have ratified the convention. It is in our best interest to proceed with the enabling legislation contained in Bill S-3, and I ask honourable senators to support this bill.

On motion of Senator Smith (Colchester), debate adjourned.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eric Cook moved the second reading of Bill S-5, to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I think I would be in part correct if I referred to Bill S-5 as an old friend of the Senate's. Generally speaking, the only thing new about the English language portion is that it is now Bill S-5, while last year it was Bill S-2. However, as I will mention later, the French language portion is different from that which is now the law.

During the last session on November 8, 1977, this bill was introduced into the Senate as Bill S-2. Between late November 1977 and early February 1978, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce held several hearings on the bill and, after hearing extensive testimony from departmental witnesses, recommended some 20 substantive amendments that were agreed to by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. These amendments were reflected in the bill when it was passed by the Senate on March 20, 1978. The bill was introduced in the House of Commons a few days later but did not proceed to second reading. As a result, the bill died on the order paper upon prorogation of the Third Session.

Notwithstanding its legislative fate, development work on the bill continued during the year. Practising lawyers, accountants, business associations and government administrators, as they gained experience working with the new law, pointed out inconsistencies in or practical problems engendered by the wording of the act. Therefore, the government has agreed to several additional, but minor, substantive amendments that are set out in this version of the bill. Virtually all of these further changes aim at simplifying and clarifying the accounting rules set out in the act, which have worked to constrain a number of unforeseen transactions that are now becoming commonplace because of amendments made last year to the Income Tax Act.

I come now to the French version of Bill S-5. Although of great practical importance to practitioners who work continually with the Canada Business Corporations Act, these substantive amendments made to the English version, so I am advised, are only a secondary objective of this bill. The principal objective of Bill S-5 is far more ambitious. It is an undertaking to enact a French version of the act that is not just a polished translation of the English, but is a correct, even elegant, statement of the law in French.

Since your committee considered the bill early this year, representatives of the Department of Justice and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have continued to meet with the special committee of the Quebec Bar, have debated their recommendations, and, wherever possible, have worked out a consensus and have proceeded to correct the French version accordingly. As a result of this process, some 60 further changes that the Department of Justice made to the French version are reflected in this bill. While admittedly not perfect, this new French version is widely accepted as a vast improvement over the French version of the present law. Needless to say, this revision work will be a continuous process but, as far as possible, minor language changes will be effected in future under the Statute Revision Act, a procedure that will obviate the preparation of particular amending acts.

At this point I would like to comment very briefly upon how impressed I have been by the work of the departmental officials who are responsible for the preparation of this bill. I am sure that all members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will agree with me that a tribute is due to all who have taken part in drafting this legislation, and in particular to Mr. John L. Howard, Q.C., Assistant Deputy Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Mr. Howard has a vast knowledge of these complicated, long and involved bills, and Canada is well served by public officials of his devotion and calibre. No one who is not a lawyer or accountant, or other trained professional involved in corporate and financial legislation, can possibly have any idea of the amount of detailed, tedious and repetitious work entailed in amending and bringing this type of legislation up to date and abreast of the best and most advanced legal, accounting and financial practices, all of which are designed to protect Canadians.

In conclusion, I should like to emphasize that the bill, like the act it proposes to amend, is an outstanding example of the time-consuming, detailed, but essential, technical work that is done, and done well, by our Senate committees. The bill and the proposed amendments are a credit to honourable senators who have devoted long hours to analysis and approval of the original legislation. If the bill receives second reading, I will move that it be referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

If and when the committee considers the bill it will be handicapped by the absence from its ranks of the former deputy chairman, the Honourable Alan Macnaughton, Q.C. As has already been stated, Alan Macnaughton is a distinguished lawyer who seldom missed a meeting of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. He is perfectly at home in both the English and French languages and has a keen well-stocked legal mind. The work of the committee was greatly aided by his contributions, which were always made with his customary courtesy and tact. He will be greatly missed by all members of the committee, and will be sorely missed by me.

Senator Walker: Would the honourable senator be good enough to tell us whether there have been any amendments to the bill in English since it was passed on the last occasion?

Senator Cook: Yes. As I stated, the government has agreed to several additional minor but substantive amendments, which can be discussed in committee.

Senator Lamontagne: In better English.

Senator Walker: And better French, if that is possible. Does the English translation follow closely the French translation?

Senator Cook: I understand there are two independent versions of the bill, one in English and one in French.

Senator Walker: Do they say the same thing, or does it depend on the personality of the translators? The honourable senator said they are completely independent. If one is a duplicate of the other they would not be entirely independent. I would ask my honourable friend to consider that, because it is my intention to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Walker, debate adjourned.

[Senator Cook]

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 26, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Rizzuto, seconded by Senator Bird, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I wish first to express my good wishes to you, Madam Speaker, to the Leaders of the Government and the Opposition, to the deputy leaders and the whips, and also to the chairmen of committees upon whose shoulders falls a heavy responsibility throughout the session. I would like to pay a special tribute, which I can do without any bias since I was not a member of either of the bodies concerned, to the two constitutional committees, one a Senate committee and the other a joint committee of the two houses. These two committees, in my view, are to be commended for the sacrifice they made this summer. It was a beautiful summer, I believe, in most parts of Canada, and yet the committee members were here for a good part of it, and travelling back and forth. They did, in my view—and I think this is a view shared by many people—an excellent job of studying, analyzing and commenting upon the proposals submitted to us earlier this year by the government.

Honourable senators, I could not be here last week, to my regret, and therefore could not do then what I am going to do now, which is to pay a simple tribute to my old friend Senator Joe Greene. I had the pleasure and honour of knowing Senator Greene well when he was active in the Government of Canada and I was a member of the Government of Newfoundland. Subsequently my wife and I had the opportunity of spending a couple of weeks with Senator and Mrs. Greene in Europe, which was an experience we enjoyed very much.

Senator Greene's death is a great loss to Canada. The loss did not occur last week, of course; it occurred several years ago when that young—when I say young, I mean he was relatively young, since I believe he was under 50 at the time—and brilliant Canadian was stricken physically, an event which precluded his carrying on as he had carried on up to that point in such a decisive and brilliant manner. Joe Greene was a good Canadian, and his passing creates a void in Canada. It may perhaps be a truism to say this, but I am going to say it anyway: we need more Joe Greenes in Canada, especially in this time of turbulence.

I would like to say a few words about my own province. It is almost 30 years now since the independent dominion of the British Commonwealth known as Newfoundland became a part of Canada. I was one of those who, along with thousands of others, tried to do their bit to influence Newfoundland to become a part of Canada, and I want to say now, looking back after those 30 years, that I would do the same again today. I think union with Canada has been a good thing for Newfoundland; I think also, in fairness, it has been, by and large, a good thing for Canada.

Newfoundland has had to make many complaints, however, as have other provinces, and although I am not going to go too far into this tonight, having already made a couple of speeches on the subject in this chamber, nevertheless I must remind honourable senators that we have had occasion in particular to deplore the quality of the service given our province by that crown corporation known as the Canadian National Railways, or whatever its designation is today. We always knew it as the CNR. At this point I am going to take a moment to read again an extract from the British North America Act, which contains the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada.

It says:

At the date of Union... Canada will take over the following services...

(a) the Newfoundland Railway—

It says nothing about downgrading or abolishing the railway. Implicit in that term of union is the moral and legal obligation on the part of Canada to maintain that railway to a standard at least as good as it was. In spite of all the jokes that have been made, I am able to say categorically that, having due regard for the limitations imposed by the dimensions of it, it was a good railway.

The railway was built to serve 300,000 people in Newfoundland. During the war that railway was called upon to perform services perhaps proportionately greater than any other services in the world. The railway was run into the ground and never had time to recuperate.

In 1949 the Government of Canada decided to pass the responsibility for the railway service over to the CNR, and made the CNR the instrument for the implementation of that term which I just read. No one objected to that decision. It was the common-sense thing to do. But from that date until now, the CNR has regarded the railway in Newfoundland as a "blank blank nuisance" to be gotten rid of in every devious way possible.

I say categorically—and I hope my words will be carried to President Banteen—that the conduct, not the behaviour but the conduct, of the CNR in respect of the rail services in Newfoundland has been disgraceful from the summer of 1949 to the present day. "Scandalous" is a better word. What the CNR has done and has not done in Newfoundland in respect to that railway is a public and national scandal. I could expatiate on that ad nauseum, I am afraid, but I am not going to spend any more time on the subject.

While I am on the other side of the ledger, let me say that we have had reason, in recent years, to be particularly grateful to the Government of Canada for certain actions taken in respect to Newfoundland, and notably in respect to fisheries. It is ironic that only now Canada is beginning to realize that one of the greatest sources of wealth for Canada, and not only for Newfoundland, lies in the fact that the waters surrounding Newfoundland and, of course, all the other Atlantic provinces, contain one of the greatest sources of wealth on the face of this earth. Year after year we tried to point out that all we needed was for the Government of Canada to do for the fisheries what, over almost a 100-year period, they had done for agriculture. That alone would have changed the whole picture of eastern Canada.

We pointed out that within three and a half miles of the shore of Newfoundland there were scores of mighty factory ships resembling ocean liners from Russia, East Germany, Poland, Spain, Portugal and France. We pointed out that if the Soviet Union was prepared to spend billions of dollars to prosecute the fisheries four miles from the coast of Newfoundland, surely Canada was losing out somewhere. The answer we received, in effect, was that under the Constitution fisheries is a provincial matter. The Government of Russia did not leave it to the provinces, nor did the Government of Spain or Portugal. How could a relatively poverty-stricken province like Newfoundland develop and prosecute the fisheries in competition with some of the greatest and wealthiest nations on the face of the earth? It called for a national effort. For all intents and purposes for 15 or 20 years, nothing was done by the Government of Canada.

That is why it gives me particular pleasure to say how appreciative we are in Newfoundland of what has been done in recent years to develop the fisheries. Only now are we as a nation beginning to realize that this is one of the greatest national assets we have.

I want to pay a special tribute tonight to the Honourable Roméo LeBlanc. So far as the Newfoundland fisheries are concerned, he has been, in our view, and particularly in my view, a good Minister of Fisheries, an intelligent and a dedicated man. He is partly responsible, along with our own minister in the Government of Canada, for this resurgence and modernization that is taking place. It has changed the whole face of the fisheries almost overnight.

I wish to say a word on the government's constitutional proposals. This has been on all our minds, especially in the last couple of days. Indeed, they were "proposals." I think the Prime Minister and others made it clear right from the start that—they were "proposals."

I am going to express my personal view on particular aspects. This is a time of great uncertainty in Canada—and I know I am stating the obvious. We have had a lot of economic turbulence in the last several years; we have had political uncertainty of one kind or another; and we have had uncertainty about national unity. At this particular time, I think the last thing we as a nation should be doing is tinkering or fooling around with the basic institutions of our country, and I am thinking of three institutions in particular.

It is not enough for anyone to say, "Well, we don't propose to do anything substantial about the monarchy." What is important is what the people of Canada believe, and the majority of people in Canada, certainly the vast majority of people of western Canada and eastern Canada, do not want the monarchy, as we understand it, interfered with in any way at all. I feel that no matter how innocent the intentions of the government may be, it is not a good time to be tinkering with the monarchy as a national institution.

My remarks apply equally, perhaps even more so, to the Supreme Court of Canada and the Senate. We know that reform is needed in the Senate. That was brought out some seven years ago in what I call the "Molgat Report." At that time, some members of this chamber made suggestions about reform in the Senate and, indeed, those reforms could have been made. The obvious one, for example, was giving western Canada more representation in this chamber. That could have been done without in any way performing major surgery on the British North America Act. I think it could be done without reference to the act at all. I have been told that by constitutional lawyers.

I repeat, in my view, this is no time to be fooling around and disturbing people still more. That is what has happened. People have been disturbed. The impression is abroad in my province, and I think from travelling in other parts of Canada it is abroad all over Canada, that in some way or another there is an intention to downgrade the monarchy. I do not think there is that intention. What is important, of course, in a situation like this is not what is actual but what the people believe, what they think.

The other point I should like to express here in connection with this controversy, if we can call it that, or in connection with this discussion of recent months, is something that, I must confess, has been a surprise to me. I think it is a tribute to the people who have served in this chamber over the years, as well as to those who are serving here right now. The Senate of Canada has far more friends than most of us ever dreamed of. This has been manifested more and more every day. We see this in newspaper editorials and in statements by people who have no axe to grind at all. We see it in the fact that the provincial governments, through most of their premiers at least, have urged that there be no major surgery performed on this institution at this time. I think that is an opinion that more and more people are beginning to hold. It may be a bit surprising, but they are perhaps realizing that the Senate is doing a very necessary job. Much of the work is being done behind the scenes in ways that are not immediately apparent, but in the long-run that work is effective.

I say this is surprising, because there is no institution in Canada—I am sorry there is nobody present from the right quarter to hear me say this, but they will get it anyway—that has been victimized so much by illiterate—and I am using my words deliberately—ignorant, irresponsible and sloppy reporting as this institution, the Senate of Canada. We see it every day. We saw an example of it only last week. I will not go through it all again, but I have here a headline from a paper which has one of the largest circulations in eastern Canada, the Evening Telegram of St. John's, Newfoundland. This was their headline: "Senate Would Not Rush Legislation." That is the headline. Now listen to the exact words of the report, which, by the way, is under the caption of the Canadian Press. This was not some novice reporter down in St. John's or Corner Brook making this up; this is from the Canadian Press:

[Senator Rowe.]

The Senate refused early this morning to rush through legislation forcing inside postal workers back to work, thus giving the union and the government an extra 24 hours to try to reach a negotiated settlement.

This is hogwash. We all know that. I was here late that night, as were most of those now present, when the bill came here. It was pointed out by the opposition, and agreed to by the Leader of the Government, that whether we went to work at 12.01 or waited until 11 o'clock the next morning made no difference to the implementation of the bill; it had to wait 24 hours. That was in the legislation. But whoever wrote that report did not look at that clause, and certainly was not aware of what transpired right here at 12 o'clock that night. That is sloppy reporting.

Of course, anybody can make a mistake. The trouble is that as far as the Senate is concerned far too many mistakes are made. Far too often we have to listen—I am using strong words, and I am doing so deliberately—to ignoramuses on TV and the radio pontificating about the Senate when they don't know what they are talking about. I am sure they have never read or analyzed, and certainly do not understand, the British North America Act; they don't know the history and the whole background that gave us this chamber; they don't know, for example, that Quebec and the maritime provinces refused to come into Confederation unless this chamber as presently constituted was brought into being. Obviously they don't know or they would not talk such nonsense as they do.

The important thing about that headline is not so much the mistake and the sloppy reporting as the fact that, as far as I know, no retraction was ever made. If it was made I did not hear it on TV or on the radio, and I did not see it in this or any other newspaper, although I normally read, I suppose, eight, ten or a dozen newspapers when I am here in Ottawa. No retraction and no correction was made. No institution in Canada has been victimized so often by sloppy and irresponsible reporting as has this Senate.

I should like to make one other comment about the constitutional proposals. It is a pity that some of the government's proposed reforms, reforms that we all agree ought to be made, and changes that could be made here based on new developments, new population developments among others, new economic developments, were not made five or six years ago. Perhaps we are partly to blame for that. Perhaps if we had brought more pressure to bear in the right quarters some of these changes would have been made.

There is one other topic I want to refer to before concluding, and that is what is called the restraint program now being put into effect in Canada. Certainly not too many people would disagree with the fact that we need some restraint at this particular time. However, I suggest that such a policy is fraught with danger. One of the dangers is that funding programs can be cut back to a point where desirable standards cannot be maintained.

I would also suggest that we have to be on our guard that Canada does not lose a very proud position which it has occupied for probably the last 50 years. It may not be precisely 50 years, but in that period Canada has been in the forefront of social legislation, along with perhaps four other countries—Denmark, Holland, Sweden and New Zealand. We were at the top in implementing enlightened human social legislation. I suggest that in the urgency to put restraint into practice there is a danger we might do irrevocable damage to that position. It would be a great pity if Canada were to lose its position in that field.

While I am on that topic—I was reminded of this the other day when representatives of the arts and cultural activities came to Ottawa and met, I believe, with the Prime Minister—it is only 30 or 40 years ago when, culturally, Canada, was one of the most backward countries among the western nations. It is only 30 years or so ago when we had no national ballet and no national opera. We were way behind in library services; we were way behind in offering cultural opportunities to our children. It was a disgraceful situation, because even 30 or 40 years ago Canada was relatively one of the wealthiest countries in the world.

Again we have to watch out that in cutting we do not cut too much. Let me sum it up by saying that while I am a great lover of sports, and I still participate in a number of them, Canada cannot live by hockey or football alone.

One final thought. I suppose every Canadian who has given much thought to national matters, and indeed provincial matters, in the last year or two has had periods of pessimism. I was reminded of that this fall. I think the CBC was at fault. There was a period when it seemed to me that every day the national news would come on with our mutilated dollar bill as the number one item. In a voice of doom, the reporter would say, "The Canadian dollar slipped another one-twenty-fifth of one per cent on the American market today." I know the value of the dollar is significant, but surely to heavens that does not have to be the main item of news day after day. It was number one priority, and millions of Canadians listening to this said, "My God, what is going to happen to us!"

As I say, all of us have had these moments of pessimism. From time to time I have had the opportunity, and I know other senators have had the opportunity, to be invited by university groups to meet with them and talk with them on different matters—history groups, philosophy groups and so on. I have enjoyed the experience. When I left them, I always had a feeling of optimism. I do not think any senator could sit down with 30 or 40 university students in any part of Canada and not come away feeling that in the long run Canada is going to be all right.

This may sound like a sermon or the next thing to a sermon. Actually, I do not care how it is regarded. But let us all in our own minds once more reaffirm our belief in the continuing greatness of our nation.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, like those who spoke before me, I want first of all to pay homage to His Excellency the Governor General and his wife, to express my admiration and my loyalty to Madam Speaker and to congratulate particularly the two senators who opened this debate and those who spoke later.

Despite the eloquence of the honourable senator who spoke before me, I shall have to paint tonight a somewhat pessimistic picture. Indeed, I intend to talk only about our current economic problems. In a speech I made in this house on the same subject on June 25, 1975, I predicted the end of the last recession while most experts held the opposite view. I was called—and I am sorry that the Leader of the Opposition is not here this evening—I was called optimistic, but the events proved me right.

Today, I am afraid that I will be called pessimistic. I hope that this time the facts will prove me wrong. I now believe that we have reached the high mark in the short term economic cycle and that a new recession will start before the end of the first quarter of 1979. I do not intend to attempt tonight to justify this prediction. I intend rather to talk about the long term structural economic problems which threaten not only Canada, but all western industrialized countries.

While conventional wisdom gives us a rather optimistic picture of the long term economic situation, I shall be more pessimistic because I believe that within the next ten or 15 years, the western world, including Canada, will witness much lower growth rates than during the post-war period and that another depression is possible in a more or less distant future if we allow the present trend to continue.

[English]

It is obvious that the industrialized countries of the Western World have been experiencing serious economic troubles since the beginning of the 1970s. In 1975 the OECD asked a group of economists, under the chairmanship of Professor Paul McCracken, to analyze those difficulties and to propose solutions. The McCracken group presented its report, entitled "Towards Full Employment and Price Stability," in June of 1977. Its main conclusion reads:

—our reading of recent history is that the most important feature was an unusual bunching of unfortunate disturbances, unlikely to be repeated on the same scale, the impact of which was compounded by some avoidable errors in economic policy.

On the basis of this optimistic assessment, the report contained the following forecast:

We believe that the period of sustained increases, in real income and employment, is a reasonable prospect, with growth rates for real GNP averaging 5½ per cent a year for the OECD area as a whole, over the five years from 1975 to 1980.

Of course, this is completely untrue as we know it at the moment.

That report has greatly influenced the prescriptions offered by conventional wisdom. It argues that, with less government intervention, business confidence will be restored and private investment will again become the prime mover of rapid economic growth. The advice it gives to governments is to cut their expenditures, reduce their deficits and taxes, stimulate savings, encourage higher productivity, move toward freer trade, stabilize national currencies through greater exports and, in general, let market forces work as freely as possible.

This is precisely what most governments of the Western World are trying to do at the present time.

I intend to question the validity of this optimistic scenario that is presented by the current conventional wisdom. I will argue, for a few minutes, that a new economic era began during the 1970s in the Western World and that the structural factors that accounted for a very rapid economic growth and expansion during the post-war period will generate much slower growth until at least 1990.

I am not alone in that thinking. In the United States, several economists are beginning to envisage this more pessimistic scenario. Professors Allvine and Tarpley of the Georgia Institute of Technology state:

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, certain fundamental conditions supporting an expanding economy changed, and the economy has now entered into a new era. The problems and prospects are quite different in the economy of the 1970s.

The deep troubles of most Western European countries are well known. Those of Sweden have received less publicity. But a recent article published in Time magazine quotes a high economic ministry official in Sweden as saying, "We have caught the English disease. It has been a numbing, demoralizing experience." The Swedish Nobel Prize winning economist, Gunnar Myrdal added:

We are at the end of a very long development. We live in a dangerous time. It is possible that everything will go to hell.

The views of Jan Tumlir and Richard Blackhurst, two senior economists working for GATT, were recently summarized by Business Week, as follows:

According to them the crisis is not cyclical but a structural phenomenon—a sort of industrial arthritis in the advanced economies. They contend that the stiffening began to overtake the industrial nations—especially the Europeans—in the late 1960s.

In my view, several factors account for the change in the fundamental conditions that had been supporting rapidly expanding economies between 1945 and 1970. I will discuss and identify briefly seven of them.

First, technological innovations. In the last two decades of the nineteenth century and early in the present century, a distinct cluster of innovations involving the creation of a vast range of new products developed into a major technological revolution, first in the United States and later in the rest of the Western World. It produced a new form of energy, namely, electricity, and three new sources of energy, hydraulic power, petroleum and natural gas. It led to a revolution in transportation, with the automobile, the truck, the tractor, and the airplane, as well as in communications with the cinema, the radio, the phonograph and later the television.

New uses for metals such as nickel, aluminum and copper were found. Wood became the raw material for the production of paper. The chemical industry developed a new range of synthetic products. The electric appliances industry appeared.

That major revolution had a tremendous potential of direct and indirect investment and employment. However, there is always a considerable time lag between the launching and the large diffusion of major innovations.

It was not really until after World War II that the full impact of technologies launched earlier began to appear. When that full impact was felt it was bound to create a long-term upsurge of economic activity. However, that revolution now appears to have reached its stage of maturity, as its great investment opportunities are becoming largely exhausted.

Moreover, there does not seem to be any new cluster of major innovations on the immediate horizon. Of course, technological progress has not come to an end. For instance, electronic equipment and components, as well as new synthetic materials, have been developed since World War II, but recent technologies seem to be related more to new processes than to new products. They involve labour-saving devices designed to improve productivity and reduce costs. Their investment and employment potential appear to be much lower than older technologies. For instance, the electronics industry, which destroys jobs throughout the economy through automation, seems to be affected at the moment by its own revolution. Total employment in that industry in the United States rose from 56,000 people in 1950 to 350,000 in 1959. It reached its peak in 1969 at 1.3 million people and stood at 1.1 million in 1975.

Thus, the recent evolution of technology and innovations in the Western World leads to less private investment and fewer employment opportunities, and may be seen as an important factor in the transition from an upward to a horizontal, and perhaps even a downward phase in long-term economic growth. An article entitled "Vanishing Innovation," which was published in Business Week last July about the situation in the United States, supports my contention in this regard.

The second factor is natural resources. In some countries of the Western World, the exploitation of new resources was a major factor in the rapid economic growth experienced during the postwar period. In Canada, however, there are growing signs that the sector of primary industries, except in the energy field, has ceased to be a major contributor to new investment and employment opportunities. The agricultural frontier is closed. The development of new energy resources will be costly and risky. Plant obsolescence, rising costs and increasing competition on world markets from Third World countries—and I will have a few words to say about that in a moment—are affecting the forestry and mining industries.

The third factor is population growth. In a general climate favourable to economic expansion, population growth can be an important factor in long-term development in that it creates an increasing demand for a wide range of goods and services, thereby inducing private and public investments. In that context, the postwar baby boom certainly contributed to rapid economic growth. However, the boom has been over for some years. In Canada, for instance, the average annual rate of population growth was 2.7 per cent in the 1950s; 1.7 per cent in the 1960s, and 1.3 per cent in the first five years of the 1970s. While the postwar baby boom has ceased to stimulate long-term economic growth, it still contributes to the worsening unemployment picture.

The fourth factor is consumer behaviour. Rising per capita personal income was also a very important factor accounting for rising trends in economic activity during the postwar period in the Western World. As I mentioned earlier, a major technological revolution had launched a wide range of products. The depression and World War II had created a huge backlog of deferred demand for those products. Rising per capita personal income meant that a growing proportion of an increasing population could afford to buy the new goods and services.

In recent years, however, new trends have appeared. Within the framework of a given state of technology, consumption has limits. Shrinking households hesitate before buying a second car, a third television set, or even a fourth radio set. As a result, aggregate demand for the products of older industries tends to become saturated in the Western World, and a growing proportion of that saturated demand is being satisfied by cheaper imported products.

At the same time, new lifestyles have appeared, putting more emphasis on the good life, on leisure and cultural activities. The north-south movement of tourists is taking on massive proportions. Such movements are not all that beneficial to the economies of some western nations, including Canada, nor are they making any great contribution to their balance of payments. Moreover, with rising incomes, people are inclined to save more, and governments, through tax incentives, are encouraging them to do so.

A recent report indicates that personal savings in Canada increased by an average of 30 per cent between 1971 and 1976, compared with a 16 per cent annual rise during the same period in personal disposal income. All this means that a declining portion of personal income is actually spent on products and services offered by advanced economies.

The fifth factor is the Third World. For several centuries, the opening up of new geographical frontiers and the existence of economic colonies represented important markets for the goods and services produced in the Western World. That situation continued to prevail during the postwar period.

External aid to the Third World was often conceived as an additional channel to market western products, and trade in military equipment rose rapidly.

The rise of Japan as a world industrial power began to alter that pattern. Today, a new model is developing in countries such as Taiwan, South Korea, Hong Kong, Singapore and Brazil—a model which mainly rests on the transfer of capital and technology rather than on the movement of goods from the west to those areas. As a result, western nations are facing increasing competition on world markets and their already saturated domestic markets are more and more invaded by cheaper imported products. This means that the Third World, instead of being a major outlet sustaining the internal expansion of the west, is becoming a threat to the further growth of western production and employment.

The sixth factor is the public sector. A new driving force that appeared in the Western World during the postwar period was the rapid development of the public sector. Military expenditures continued to rise after World War II; governments assumed responsibility for the protection of individuals and families against social insecurity and for meeting an increasing range of collective needs. That evolution meant a tremendous upsurge in public expenditures in terms of transfer payments, goods and services, and investments. More particularly, huge investments were made in transportation, communications, educational facilities, hospitals and housing.

In recent years, however, with much slower population growth, the need for this type of investment has substantially diminished. Indeed, there may have been over-investment in the public sector, and surplus capacity exists in certain areas such as education. Moreover, as taxes and budgetary deficits were rising, public resistance has grown against mounting government expenditures. Today, the public sector in the Western World is expanding much less rapidly than it used to some years ago, and serious attempts are being made to further reduce the process of expansion.

Finally, the seventh factor, the social climate: In the postwar period the social climate was quite favourable to economic growth and private investment. Western societies enjoyed internal peace and political stability. It was relatively easy in those years to reach a consensus on most basic issues; prices were stable, and the future could be envisaged with some degree of certainty, confidence and optimism.

Today, western societies are deeply divided and unstable. Canada is far from being unique in this respect. Most countries of Western Europe suffer in various degrees from the same social disease. Canadians seldom realize that the United States is already deeply affected by the same social disease. In a penetrating article entitled "The Balkanization of America", Kevin Phillips illustrates this thesis as follows:

All too many examples suggest themselves: The concealing of the melting pot, and the re-emergence of ethnicity; the proliferation of sexual preferences and religious cults; the new political geography of localism and neighbourhoods; the substitution of causes for political parties; the narrowing of loyalties; the fragmentation of government; the twilight of authority . . . small loyalties are replacing larger ones. Small outlooks are also replacing larger ones.

The factions composing advanced societies suffer from the complex of guilt transfer and governments have become the scapegoats. It is not really the fault of governments if older technologies have reached their maturity, if new technologies destroy more jobs than they generate, if fewer children are born and if people ask for more than they contribute, and if they want to use their rising incomes to buy foreign products, to travel abroad and to increase their savings. Yet governments are blamed for the consequences of those new trends that are leading to declining investment opportunities. As a result, political instability has developed throughout the west. The whole social climate has become confused, uncertain, and even inimical to the risk-taking that is required to sustain rising private investments and long-term growth.

Honourable senators, I have listed—and you have been very patient with me—seven major factors that could account for a fundamental change in the general economic conditions of the Western World during the coming years. The scenario I have presented is certainly more pessimistic, but perhaps also more realistic than the one envisaged by the current conventional wisdom. My scenario foresees a long interruption of rapid growth which, coupled with another recession, could mean a serious depression. It claims that western economies are facing a chronic excess of productive capacity. In that perspective, international trade deficits and monetary disorders are mere symptoms of a much deeper structural crisis.

But those symptoms in themselves are also most worrying. For instance, it is not an exaggeration to say that central banks in the United States and Canada—more particularly in the United States, and in Canada as a consequence—have lost control over monetary policy for all practical purposes. They are forced to implement successive increases in their interest rates to sustain not economic growth or the national economy, but to sustain and protect national currencies, even if such unprecedentedly high rates will inevitably contribute to further weakening of the two national economies. This paradoxical situation could mean serious trouble during the next recession.

I sincerely hope that the conventional wisdom is right, that the world will soon come out of its present troubles and resume its "normal" growth. But I suggest that it is only common prudence to consider the possibility that basic changes are occurring, and that several factors such as those I have already mentioned may lead to much slower growth rates than those enjoyed during the post-war period. That possibility should be carefully examined not only here in the Senate, but in the other place, and on a much wider platform as I shall suggest in a moment. A strategy should be developed to cope with it, because policies designed to deal with slow or negative growth are quite different from those applicable to expanding economies. If we do not have to implement those policies, little will be lost, but if the pessimistic scenario develops and if no strategy has been prepared for it, the Western World will indeed be in great difficulty.

Most of us still remember, I am sure, the social, political and even military consequences of the unexpected 1930s. I suggest that the Western World is now suffering from basic problems similar to those experienced in the late 1920s, and that we are unfortunately trying to approach them with the same attitudes and the same policies.

In his message to Congress in December 1929, President Hoover was announcing measures designed to balance the budget and to tighten the money supply, thus hoping to restore confidence and stimulate private investment, in order, and I quote, "to make certain that the fundamental business of the country shall continue as usual." We all know that what happened afterwards was anything but "usual."

Today, uncontrolled international speculation on the U.S. dollar is producing a highly explosive situation more or less similar to the attacks suffered by the British pound 50 years ago. We are fighting inflation as if demand, instead of supply, was responsible. Governments are attempting to withdraw from the economic scene at a time when private enterprise suffers from chronic excess capacity and declining private investment opportunities. While nations are discussing freer trade in Geneva, they are implementing beggar-my-neighbour policies at home, as if they could export those difficulties. All those elements were present in the late 1920s. In addition, in Canada, provincial governments were then assuming, more or less as they are trying to do today, the main responsibility for defining and implementing industrial strategy.

I am convinced that the current monetary crisis is of such a nature that no country in the world, not even the United States, can go it alone. It is regrettable, therefore, that the economic summit held in Bonn last July did not consider the deeper aspects of that crisis but confined itself to the diagnoses and prescriptions of the conventional wisdom.

Perhaps the economic climate prevailing last July was not yet propitious for such a consideration.

I suggest that another summit should be held early next year. It is to be hoped that by then the European Economic Community will have agreed on its new monetary arrangements. Perhaps also by then another recession will have started and it will have become more obvious that the remedies of the conventional wisdom are not working.

Under those different circumstances, governments might well be inclined to recognize the limits of their own respective remedial powers and recognize also the need for drastic changes in their policies.

I believe that such policy changes cannot be made by one country acting alone. International co-operation and joint action, at least by governments representing industrialized countries, are absolutely essential. For those reasons, and in conclusion, I suggest that Canada take the initiative in this respect and propose the holding of another economic summit early in 1979.

Senator Deschatelets: Would Senator Lamontagne allow me a question?

Senator Lamontagne: Yes.

Senator Deschatelets: First I would like to congratulate you for your comments. At the same time, I hope that the scenario you have described will not develop as you predicted. You referred to six or seven factors of instability which could lead us to another depression in the near future.

I listened very closely, but I do not remember that you mentioned once the word inflation. Do you not consider that this world-wide factor is one of the factors of instability experienced in all the countries of our hemisphere as well as in Europe and for which our economists have not even yet begun to find an answer? Could you tell us a word about inflation?

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, Senator Deschatelets says that he listened carefully to what I said, but that I did not mention inflation. In fact I mentioned it several times.

Senator Deschatelets: Yes, but not as a factor.

Senator Lamontagne: Yes, as a factor, as I said, for which supply and suppliers of goods and services are much more responsible than demand. Right now we are trying in an absolutely unrealistic way to fight against inflation as if there was an excessive demand when it is in fact more especially a development of demand, the fact that supply and suppliers have become far more monopolistic and increasingly control the prices they will ask for their products and services.

Therefore I feel that we are trying to fight inflation on the wrong front, the consequences of which are far more serious in that the fight is artificial. Because of that, we have to face the international speculation which is in the process of creating a truly explosive situation, as I said before. The situation is just as explosive as it was at the end of the '20s. The present speculation on the American dollar is no more justifiable than were the attacks of which the pound sterling was the victim in 1928, 1929 and 1930.

So, because we are fighting our battles on the wrong front, we are creating a whole artificial world: this can only lead us to catastrophe.

RETIREMENT AGE POLICIES

FISHERIES

RESEARCH LABORATORY, HALIFAX—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Could the Leader of the Government inform us about the present status of plans to discontinue the federal fisheries research laboratory in Halifax?

Senator Perrault: That question will be taken as notice, honourable senators.

THE CONSTITUTION

EFFECT OF BY-ELECTION ON BILL TO ABOLISH THE SENATE—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to pose a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: I don't wonder.

Senator Marshall: My question has to do with the recent by-election held in the constituency of Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, in which the NDP candidate was elected. The by-election came about as a result of my appointment to the Senate. In view of the many accolades about the value of the Senate that were bestowed at the First Ministers' Conference yesterday, particularly by Premiers Hatfield and Lyon, I wonder if the Leader of the Government would ask Mr. Stanley Knowles of the other place if he will now withdraw his bill to abolish the Senate.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Senate has always taken the position that there is light in the window for those who are fallen from the path and those who can be educated to a higher form of thought.

SAFE CONTAINERS CONVENTION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Petten for the second reading of Bill S-3, to implement the International Convention for Safe Containers.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I am sure you will be glad to know that I do not expect to detain you very long with what I have to say on this bill.

As Senator Petten said last night in his brief and clear comments, this bill appears to be an almost exact replica of Bill S-4, which we dealt with in the last session. Bill S-4 was debated at some length then by a number of senators. If anyone wishes to refer to the debate, it can be found in Hansard for December 8, 1977, December 13, 1977, and December 14, 1977. That bill received second reading without any substantial criticism, and was then referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

In my remarks today I shall mention only one or two points that were dealt with in last year's debate. One point is really not particularly relevant to the bill itself, except that I would draw attention, as I did last year, to the provision of clause 5, whereby certain orders equivalent to orders in council are made by the Governor in Council. These orders shall be laid before both houses of Parliament within a certain time of being passed. Thus, the bill gives an opportunity for both houses to consider any such order.

It seems to me that in this day of such a deluge of orders about a great many things, some of which are of extreme importance to the public at large, this is a good practice to follow. I am glad to see it in this bill. It seems to me that we should encourage the practice of making sure that all orders in council or orders of that nature are, in fact, subject to review by both houses of Parliament. I do not for a moment suggest that every such order should be, because there is a myriad of them. However, there are some which are of such fundamental importance that it seems to me this opportunity for review should be contained in the legislation authorizing the orders in council that are the subject matter of the particular legislation. This would tend to make the people who draw such orders keep their mind on the responsibility of Parliament for legislation and what happens under legislation passed by that Parliament.

The other point I should like to mention is that I do not think there is any substantial opposition to the provisions of this bill in the trade or anywhere else. As I said during the debate last session, I had the opportunity to make some inquiries among those who are knowledgeable about the use of containers, and I found no opposition to this bill. I do not believe that situation has changed, and therefore it seems to me that there is no need now for me to go into any particular matter contained in the bill.

It might interest honourable senators to know that the bill was considered at some length by the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on Wednesday, February 8, 1978, the proceedings of which appear in issue No. 6 of that committee. Officials of the Department of Transport who attended before the committee were: Mr. Jean L. Charron, Assistant Deputy Minister, Co-ordination; Mr. Peter Cameron, Director, International Relations; Mr. Clifford A. Rose, Senior Adviser, International Relations, and Mr. Alfred Popp, solicitor.

The many questions asked by honourable senators seem to have been satisfactorily answered, because the committee reported the bill with only minor amendments that were put forward by the department itself in order to correct some drafting in the legislation which they thought should be corrected.

It is not my intention to suggest that this bill should be referred to committee again. However, I am not trying to pre-empt the right of any other senator to make that suggestion and, of course, the sponsor of the bill, Senator Petten, may have different views on the subject.

That is all I have to say. I do recommend favourable consideration of the bill.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Petten speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, there is nothing further I can really add to the excellent presentation made by my honourable colleague Senator Smith (Colchester). As Senator Smith pointed out, this bill was referred to committee in the last session, following which it received third reading in the Senate. With that in mind, I do not propose, if honourable senators see fit to give the bill second reading, to refer it to committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Senator Petten moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Cook for the second reading of Bill S-5, to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, Bill S-5 is a fairly detailed bill. The bill as introduced in this session contains several minor changes, all of which are aimed at making the bill more accurate.

The sponsor of the bill, Senator Cook, outlined in a very clear way exactly what had been done. I am not quite sure of the parallel he drew as to whether the English translation follows the French or the French follows the English. In any event, it looks pretty good. There are, however, certain details we would like to have cleared up, and for that reason I would respectfully suggest that the bill be referred to Senator Hayden's committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Cook moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Rizzuto, seconded by Senator Bird, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I suppose that by now both the mover and the seconder of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne feel that any congratulations offered to them on this the last day of the Throne Speech debate would be but a matter of pleasing or pleasant Senate custom. I hope they do not feel this way, for even at this late date I would like to join with those who have preceded me in this debate in extending congratulations to both the mover and seconder for a job well done. In my opinion, the first speeches on the Speech from the Throne are the most difficult to give, and I always admire those who perform this task well, as was the case on this occasion.

May I also extend my congratulations to our Speaker, who has presided over our deliberations with such knowledge and fairness, and in such a gracious manner. I must add, however, that I have been disappointed that she has not yet seen fit to follow suggestions I have made from time to time that she have the uniforms of the staff of the Senate in this chamber, and her own, changed from the traditional black to a more modern colour.

Senator Langlois: Red?

Senator Macdonald: Indeed, I suggest that the change from somber black to a more modern colour—say, a nice, rich crimson—would go well with this chamber.

Senator Marshall: How about blue?

Senator Macdonald: The only reason I can give why black is the traditional colour of the courts and Parliament is that black did not show the dirt. That is surely no longer an argument for continuing with the use of such somber garments. Indeed, in this day and age we should do away with any uniforms that give the suggestion we are in mourning or attending a wake.

Senator Flynn: Shall we change the black rod to red?

Senator Macdonald: I suppose, if custom is followed, much as we regret it, our Speaker will be changed in the next Parliament, so I do hope that she will read these remarks of mine and bring about what I believe will be a vast improvement, before her term of office expires.

Senator Walker: An early election?

Senator Macdonald: I would have liked an election long ago, but I was not consulted about that matter.

Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne, as do all such speeches, contains some plans for future government action that have general approval. It is not my purpose today to mention these, because they have already been mentioned more than once by those who support the government. Nevertheless, there are a few other matters on which I should like to make a comment or two. Before doing so I want to say that I was pleased that the government stated in the Speech from the Throne that it did not intend to reduce or downgrade the role of the monarchy in our parliamentary system. I think that reference to the monarchy, even though it was inserted near the end of the Speech, showed that the government got the message that the people of Canada do not want the monarchy to be downgraded. Indeed, some suspicion remains that the government is not as innocent in this matter as it now proclaims. I found my own point of view was better stated, perhaps, than I could do myself, by an editorial in the London Free Press of October 13, 1978, and I would like to quote it.

The Trudeau government's reaffirmation in the Throne Speech that it has no intention of diminishing the monarchy's role in Canada will not reassure Canadians who suspect otherwise.

If the government wanted to make its point unequivocally, it should have stated clearly that it would withdraw from its proposals for constitutional reform the reference to the Queen which has fuelled fears that Ottawa is trying to reduce the monarchy's role. It has not done so; consequently suspicions will persist among those who are adamantly opposed to any tinkering with the Queen's constitutional role.

Ottawa should leave the monarchy alone, and should provide supporting evidence of its intention by abandoning the redefinition of the Queen's role now contained in federal constitutional reform legislation. Many Canadians are obviously unconvinced by the government's insistence that it is merely trying to reflect the current roles of the Governor General and Queen in Canada, and is not bent on assigning the monarchy a subsidiary function.

Honourable senators, if the government wants wholly to reassure those who are still suspicious of its ultimate objectives, and I am one of them, it will withdraw from its proposals all reference to the monarchy.

There is another matter which, while not in the Speech from the Throne, has become of grave concern, and that is the relationship between the government and its employees in the public service. The recent strike of some Post Office employees brought this matter to the attention of the public in a very forceful manner. Consequently, the matter of collective bargaining, which of course includes the right to strike in the public service, is now being questioned, and from many quarters comes a demand that it be re-examined.

In order to refresh my memory, honourable senators, I read over the debates which took place in this chamber in February of 1967, when the bill was being considered which gave those in the public service the right to strike. It was a good debate and it seemed to me that the reasons given for the bill were very convincing. I believe I spoke in favour of it. It is only fair to say, however, that several senators had certain misgivings, and, indeed, such misgivings have turned out to have been only too well founded. In any event, the bill became law, and the only persons not getting the right to strike were those charged with the responsibility of providing for the safety and security of the state.

Honourable senators, when the sponsor of that bill, Senator Bourget, concluded the debate on second reading, he made an interesting observation, which I should like to quote:

The legislation will be successful to the extent that the employer, bargaining agents and the employees they represent, are prepared to meet the challenges of collective bargaining in a mature and responsible manner. Goodwill and a spirit of "give and take" will be required on both sides of the bargaining table.

He added, "I wish them well."

How true and how far-sighted was that observation. As you know under the legislation a great many agreements have been negotiated without any strikes or threat of strikes. The recent strike of inside postal workers, however, after weeks of uncertainty, brought about a strong public demand to stop such a strike by legislation, and this was done. By so doing, of course, Parliament took away the right to strike from those employees who had been given that right in the 1967 legislation. The whole idea of strikes in what are called essential public services has been brought into question, and I believe that an examination of the 1967 legislation is now necessary to see how it can be improved so as to take care of situations where, obviously, the collective bargaining process does not work, as in the recent postal strike.

May I add that I do not quite understand just what happened in that case. Ordinarily, one would have expected agreement to be reached or negotiations to be broken off and a strike called long before, indeed months before, the parties finally agreed to disagree. As I understand it, the inside postal workers' agreement expired on June 30, 1977, so I presume negotiations for a new agreement began prior to that time. It was only in October of 1978, 15 months later, that negotiations were finally broken off and a legal strike called. To my way of thinking, such a prolonged period of negotiations is an abuse of the collective bargaining principle. In any event, I feel that some provision must be made to take care of such a situation in the future.

Personally, I would favour a policy by both parties to the effect—no agreement, no work. I believe there is at least one union in the United States that follows such a policy with beneficial results. As a general rule the parties come to terms eventually, so I feel it would make for a better relationship between the parties if a new agreement had to come into effect once the old one expired. Of course, such a process would imply some type of binding arbitration in those services that are considered essential by the general public.

I was interested to read an editorial in the The Chronicle-Herald of Halifax of October 19 last on this very point. While I think the scope is wider there than I should like or agree with as regards essential services, I think it puts the case very well. I quote a section of that article:

The way things work now, it seems, is that, for a time after a contract expires, nothing is done. Eventually, the parties begin to negotiate. Then talks break down. A strike follows. After that, somebody begins to take the matter seriously. Government gets into the act. Eventually, if no agreement is forthcoming, binding arbitration is invoked and, ultimately, matters are straightened out. By that time, the moment is at hand for new contract bargaining and the same inane process begins again.

Would not a policy work better which required that new contracts be agreed upon before the expiration of the previous contract? Would it not be preferable to impose compulsory and binding arbitration upon the parties concerned if, within a set period, say two weeks, before a contract expired a new one had not been worked out? Actually, such a practice would simply be a speeding up of what is happening now without all the inconveniences the public is called upon to sustain.

Generally speaking, I am in agreement with the remarks made here by Senator Forsey on October 24. While his language is more colourful than mine, my position is about the same. There has to be legislation to deal with this loophole in the present law. I agree with him that there is, in fact, no free collective bargaining now in essential services and, of course, there would have to be a definition or enumeration of what Parliament considers to be essential services.

I am surprised that this important matter of collective bargaining in the public service was not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. The government must have known of the existence of the problem. Indeed, collective bargaining was mentioned at some length in the Speech from the Throne delivered on October 12, 1976. Let me quote briefly from it:

It is intended to establish a collective bargaining information centre, which will offer objective economic and compensation data to all parties. It is also intended to encourage greater participation by plant workers in decisions affecting their working conditions; to expand labour education programs; to develop a voluntary code of fair practices; and to establish a national institution dedicated to improving the quality of life in the workplace.

It goes on further to say:

Measures will be proposed to improve the collective bargaining system in the public service, to reduce the adversarial nature of the process and to ensure an equitable relationship between compensation levels in the public and private sectors.

Two years ago the government gave notice that it was going to deal with and improve the collective bargaining system in the public service, but nothing was done. I say that by its neglect the government as a whole, as well as the Post Office, is responsible in a large measure for the unhappy situation which now exists in the Post Office. I feel that anyone who believes that making the Post Office a crown corporation is going to cure the matter, is not being realistic.

There are, of course, many matters of interest mentioned in the Speech from the Throne apart from the many pious platitudes it contains. For example, in a vague way it mentions what I consider to be the most important issue facing us today, and that is unemployment. The Speech from the Throne mentions that:

The major thrust of the Government's employment strategy is to encourage the creation of permanent jobs in the private sector.

In more than one place it is either stated or implied that funds for this and other works will be found by reducing unemployment insurance benefits. Therefore, in effect, it is the unemployed who have contributed to unemployment insurance and who are entitled to it who are going to be made to suffer for the failure of the government's economic policies or the lack of such policies. This proposed policy is a policy to take from those who have little in the hope it will help those who have less.

Honourable senators, in looking over prior Speeches from the Throne, one can see that the government acknowledges the existence of the unemployed. One can also see the pathetic efforts by the government to deal with the problem. The words were brave but the performance was weak.

The Speech from the Throne of 1970 stated:

Unemployment remains distressingly high in some parts of Canada—

The 1972 Speech stated:

Unemployment continues to be a matter of intense concern to the Government—

In 1973 it was stated that in economic policy the first objective was to expand job opportunities at a rate that would bring about a decline in the number of unemployed. In the 1974 Speech from the Throne we find it stated that a principal responsibility of the government, and one of its main policy objectives, was to maintain high levels of income, production and employment. I would ask you to make careful note of that, honourable senators. In 1976 we find this remark in the Speech from the Throne:

In pursuit of the goal of a higher rate of employment, it will be necessary to improve the efficiency of the labour market and actively hasten the return of unemployed workers to productive effort.

Yet now the government, at this late date, is acknowledging the failure of its past policies and hopes now to encourage the creation of jobs in the private sector. Apparently it has abandoned the concept of direct job creation by government, as was also mentioned in the 1976 Speech from the Throne.

In my opinion, unemployment is the first and the greatest problem facing us today. I think it demands our main attention. After that will come all other matters. After that, as far as I am concerned, would come the issue of inflation, national unity, the Constitution, the distribution of powers and the like. Personally, I have not heard of many people getting too excited about the Constitution, but I have heard a great many people expressing great concern about unemployment. I say this, that among the unemployed there is a nervous suspicion that any change that the government makes in the act will be detrimental to them, and, frankly, I share that view.

[Senator Macdonald.]

Honourable senators, let us keep our priorities in mind. Unemployment must, I think, be our first concern and, if that problem can be solved, all the other matters that concern Canadians can be dealt with in due course, and in a much easier fashion.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your attention.

[Translation]

Hon. Bernard Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, first allow me to congratulate our gracious Speaker who presides so well over the debates of our house.

I also extend my best wishes to the Governor General and his charming wife for their generous and friendly contribution to the leadership of our country. They set an example for all Canadians.

To all my colleagues who have spoken before me in the course of this debate, I offer my congratulations.

[English]

There are a number of things about which I should speak, but, first of all, I must mention some of the pressing issues relating to my own region of the country. I want to say a word about the coal industry in my province.

Of major significance is an offshore drilling program amounting to $12 million, financed on an 80:20 percentage basis by Canada and Nova Scotia, which is now nearing completion in the Sydney coalfield. I should first underline the importance of this program. Prior to drilling it was estimated that the probable reserves of the Sydney coalfield were about 332 million tons. In that section of the Sydney coalfield off Donkin alone the drilling program discovered reserves estimated at over 650 million tons, and the probable reserves of the whole coalfield are now estimated at 990 million tons, three times the estimate of just one year ago.

That key investment on the part of Canada and Nova Scotia led to the discovery of what might well be described as the spectacular Donkin bloc. Let me explain. To employ long-wall mining a coal seam must be over five feet high. Off Donkin there is not one but three seams five feet high or higher, layered one over the other. While detailed feasibility studies are not yet completed, it is hoped that Devco will be able to mine all three of these seams. At just two million tons of production per year—if it is confined indeed to that—that alone could represent close to 200 years of coal mining in that particular area.

You might well ask: What does all this mean for the future of industrial Cape Breton? It can mean a great deal if we proceed properly. In the summer of 1977 the first holes were drilled, and in the summer just past additional holes were drilled. In the spring of this year the federal cabinet approved the five-year plan of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, which included a new mine at Donkin, complete rehabilitation of No. 26 mine, and $66 million in improvements of rail, storage, shipping and handling facilities. That package alone amounts to $266 million. In my judgment, these developments are among the most important in that part of Canada since the beginning of this century.

There are those, of course, who want to start digging at Donkin today, but I cannot over-emphasize that the new Donkin mine and the new No. 26 mine must be developed with great care. Miners' lives and their future security depend upon how well the government and the company do their jobs. Cape Bretoners do not want mines that have to be subsidized, nor do they want mines planned on the back of an envelope. We want mines that pay. We want mines that will assist the industrial development efforts of Devco. We want mines that contribute to solving Nova Scotia's, and indeed Canada's, energy problems. We want mines that provide future employment with dignity.

Devco has hired the consultants. Devco is getting on with the job. Just as a matter of interest, Devco's Lingan mine, one of the most modern in the world, was described by a visiting German consultant recently as the most productive long-wall mine in the world. I am confident that the Donkin mine and the new No. 26 mine will be as good as, or better than, Lingan, provided, of course, they are properly planned and developed.

In relation to the overall energy question there has been considerable comment with respect to the development of Fundy tidal power. I should point out that the Fundy Tidal Power Review Board presented a report to the Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and federal governments early this year, following a two-year $3.6 million re-examination of electricity generation potential. This report makes positive recommendations on several issues. I understand that a preferred site has been identified in the Cumberland Basin. The economics of tidal energy have improved substantially, relative to alternative means of electric power generation, since the previous review of 1969, although I should point out that, as I understand it, the board's report does not offer the prospect of lower cost electricity.

The Government of Canada, through the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Gillespie, has responded positively to the report, indicating that the government would support the Phase II program of pre-feasibility design to be carried out by the Maritime Energy Corporation. I understand that negotiations for the establishment of this particular corporation are continuing with the three maritime provinces. While it is obvious that I cannot speak for any of the parties concerned, I do hope that the remaining issues can be resolved by the end of 1978. The benefits of integrated planning and construction of electrical facilities are very important to reduce cost increases for electricity in the maritime region, and I believe that such integration is absolutely essential to the incorporation of tidal energy.

The steel industry in Nova Scotia continues to struggle through a very difficult period. The present soft nature of the market is a world-wide problem. Despite this, however, the Sydney Steel Corporation, through an aggressive, wide-ranging sales approach, has put together what appears to be a very sound order book for 1979, and further prospects appear promising. The most immediate problem, however, is plant modernization. While the prime responsibility in such a massive undertaking rests with the Government of Nova Scotia, it is hoped that studies and assessments now under way will justify the kind of major, long-term rehabilitation program which I personally would be most anxious to encourage the Government of Canada to support.

Reference has been made to federal budget cut-backs and their effect on fisheries research by the possible closure of the Fisheries Technological Laboratory in Halifax. I too have expressed concern about this, and I have discussed the question at some length with the Minister of Fisheries. In the first instance, he assures me that overall federal fisheries research is increasing, rather than declining. Since the 200-mile limit was imposed in 1977, the federal Department of Fisheries has added 125 man-years and more than $14 million to marine and fisheries research, and has had a fourfold increase of resource assessment work carried out in offshore waters. This activity will continue.

I am informed that any reduction of technological development work would only affect technological research done specifically for the benefit of the processing industry. There will be no cutback affecting fish stock research, fishing gear development or any other work in support of the primary industry.

The secondary industry work is related to such matters as the preservation and storage of fish, processing and canning technology, and new products from fish and marine plant life. The federal government's position, as I understand it, is that, although these projects are worthy, its emphasis will be on the management of the fishery itself. The minister also points out that the current prosperity in the fisheries, resulting from the 200-mile limit and the federal management policy adopted in 1975, has made the processing industry more profitable. He contends that the industry itself should now be in a better position to support technological work, and he has given assurance that the federal government will help ensure an orderly transition of this work to the private sector.

Against this background, I can only conclude that the federal government's fisheries research program is keeping pace with the advantages and opportunities developed through the imposition of the 200-mile limit. The minister is still reviewing the question of the closure of the Halifax laboratory, as indeed the minister undertook to do. In the meantime, I must say that I am personally satisfied that the primary industry, as a whole, is not only having its level of research maintained but, indeed, increased.

In the Speech from the Throne, honourable senators, the government called for action on two fronts—the strengthening of our economy, and the renewal of our federation. These subjects have been well covered by previous speakers, so I would like to use the remaining time at my disposal to touch on another subject which is causing concern, a concern which transcends partisan political lines, although I have a natural concern about my party. Who could blame me, after some of the recent by-election results.

What I am really worried about is the prevalent mood and spirit in our country. I am concerned about the negativism being displayed by Canadians. Whether it be in the media, in the home or on the streets, a profound sense of cynicism regarding our country, its institutions and its people is spreading throughout the nation. As Canadians, we have always looked to our future with a sense of optimism. We have looked to our institutions with respect and, indeed, we have looked to our fellow citizens with good will. However, at this moment in time, I believe that our spirit is sadly lacking and we seem, as a people, to be suffering from a severe case of myopia. We seem to be incapable of perceiving anyone else's problems. We are so busy gazing at our own provincial, regional, municipal or personal problems, whatever they may be, that we are unable or unwilling to focus on some of the larger issues confronting our country, and in the process we are forming countless little enclaves, each unwilling to even acknowledge the existence of the others, let alone sympathize or help with their problems.

Not too long ago I had the good fortune to attend an international conference which dealt with diverse global trouble spots. I had occasion to reflect upon the fact that in Canada we are fortunate in being able to settle our differences by the ballot, not the bullet. Yet we must be concerned by the vehemence with which our public leaders and institutions are castigated by the populace and by some members of the media.

In the past, Canadians always respected their ideological opponents, even if they did not necessarily agree with them. In the current mood of cynicism and scepticism, it seems perfectly acceptable to reduce the level of any debate to a personal one. Our society seems to be coagulating around groups or organizations whose titles invariably have the prefix "anti". How often do we see this narrow, self-interest philosophy expressed today. He or she is anti-labour, anti-French, anti-government, anti-business—anti-this or anti-that. I often wonder if there is anyone left who is for anything in our society other than his own self interest. Is there anyone left who is prepared to emphasize the positive aspects of our life in Canada, particularly when it is compared to life in other countries of the world?

I am deeply troubled that Canadians are losing faith in our institutions—the very institutions that have helped not only to build our successful and prosperous society but also to hold it together. I am not just talking about people being cynical about the federal government today. They are cynical about all governments, businesses and unions. They are cynical about the law enforcement agencies in our country. They are cynical about almost everything.

In my travels across the country, I find that we are becoming what one might call progressively demoralized. We are only interested in complaining about our own problems, and it is becoming increasingly difficult to turn this negativism around into a positive force. Someone said recently that we are so good at running things down, people think the country is really going down the drain. People believe that none of our institutions can be trusted. We find that not only are some people anti-government, but they are anti-black, anti-immigration, and anti-foreign aid.

More and more Canadians are adopting a personal philosophy of "me first and the devil take the hindmost." This is exactly the philosophy espoused in the current bible of the "me" generation entitled Looking Out for Number One. Just as distressing is that this attitude is usually strongest in the more prosperous neighbourhoods of our country. I suppose we have always been selfish to some degree, but not so long ago we had time to think of others. There was a fellowship, a companionship, a sense of compassion which we do not sense today.

While everybody argues vociferously for this or that government service to be curtailed or cut, no one is willing to forego the particular service that he or she deems essential. Thus it is that we often have the same people one week seeking higher subsidies and the following week demanding lower taxes.

I remember a year ago travelling with members of the Atlantic caucus in Atlantic Canada and listening—

Senator Flynn: Which caucus?

Senator Graham: The Atlantic Liberal caucus.

Senator Smith (Colchester): No wonder you didn't feel happy.

Senator Graham: I was happy then, and I am happy today. We heard submissions from various constituencies or elements in our society. One businessman said, "We want less government intervention; we want lower taxes; we want a new steel mill and two new coal mines," and someone interjected, "Well, would you please make up your mind."

Most of us, whether young or not so young, want everything, and we want it now—and, of course, there are many legitimate demands. But they all add up to more money at a time when the economy is giving us less, and everyone knows or should know that to take more means less for others. Yet everyone acts as though greater restraint and greater productivity should be practised by someone else.

No one denies the need for still more economic improvement and for a realistic appraisal of where weakness continues to exist. There is room for legitimate debate over what remains to be done to reduce disparities, and to give Canadians greater confidence in the future. But we should not let our concerns about the future obscure our ability to appreciate some of the advantages that we already possess. Exaggeration and distortion of problems can be dangerous. It can weaken public confidence and undermine the will essential for greater progress.

Excessive optimism, of course, is equally dangerous. In my judgment, we must be realistic in our approach to all things.

In the heat of debate, objectivity is becoming sometimes a scarce commodity. High blown partisan rhetoric is too often too emotional. But objectivity is necessary for wise decision-making, and seldom have the issues required a more sober realistic approach in our country.

Day after day, week after week, some sources in the media never cease to magnify the faults and failings of our society. They criticize our people and our institutions, failing to distinguish between constructive criticism and that criticism which has a demoralizing effect on our society. It is little wonder, then, that Canadians, force-fed a constant diet of such utter negativism, become themselves jaded and cynical.

I am afraid that we are in danger of becoming a nation of timid bystanders who do little more than criticize those who are striving, too intent on navel-gazing to perceive the larger issues challenging us, and perhaps too selfish to reach out a hand in friendship to those in need.

Our country, honourable senators, was born in a spirit of fellowship and co-operation. The pioneers who forged a nation from this land—the French, the English, the Italians, the Ukrainians and the Poles, people of every ethnic origin, Canadians all—did so by helping one another during times of adversity. They were motivated by mutual respect and understanding, and love.

I am not advocating a cessation of criticism. Far from it. What is required at present is constructive comment, not demoralizing rhetoric—rhetoric which only serves to sap our collective will and confidence as a people. Of course, we have problems, but none of such magnitude that they cannot be overcome with a spirit of confidence and co-operation. Great nations such as ours were not built on petty selfish foundations, but on noble and honourable ideas. If we fail, given the resources, human and otherwise, that we have been blessed with in this land, then I conclude that there is even less hope for the countless other nations of the world that are troubled with adversities which dwarf any we are currently facing.

It is time for Canadians to put aside their partisan and regional differences. It is time for us to cast off our current pessimism. It is time for us to renew our faith in our country and its future.

As Canadians have always done, we must choose co-operation, and compromise over confrontation. In the minds and hearts of all Canadians, there must be a commitment to fairness and justice. We can, and we must, sustain our confidence. We must be bold and we must be adventuresome. We must continue to search for those directions and policies which provide equal opportunity and which make all Canadians feel at home in every part of our country.

The prospect of a still better life for all Canadians provides the impetus for an even greater effort and for a renewed commitment to fully achieve the vast untapped potential that Canada possesses.

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, it was not my intention to take part in this debate, and I do not now intend to do so at any length. I want to congratulate my friend and colleague from Nova Scotia on an excellent and eloquent speech. There was one point, however, that he made which I cannot let pass without comment, the reason being that I am so utterly convinced that it is so utterly wrong. I refer to the reason given by the Minister of Fisheries, and repeated today—in perfect good faith, I know—by the distinguished senator who has just spoken, but which I think is a completely wrong approach to a problem which is of the utmost importance to Nova Scotia.

The matter to which I refer is the philosophy which the Minister of Fisheries has put forward as his reason for thinking that it would be a good thing, or at least an excusable thing—I am not sure that he said it would be a good thing—to do away with the fisheries research laboratory at Halifax. He gives the reason, as I understand the honourable senator—and, indeed, as I understood what I read of the minister's reasoning—that it will not hurt the fishing industry in Nova Scotia if there is a reduction in the kind of research on processing and marketing which has been for so long and so efficiently carried on by that research laboratory.

I happen to hold a completely different view, because I believe that the more efficiently the catch of the fishermen can be processed once it is ashore, the more efficiently it can be marketed, and the more attractively it can be placed before the public as a nutritious and good tasting food, the better it will be for those who go down to the sea in ships to reap the harvest of the sea. It seems to me, therefore, that the minister's action in doing away with this facility, which I think everyone will agree has done a great deal over the years to encourage better and more efficient processing, better marketing and more appealing packaging, is a completely and utterly mistaken action. I think it can only arise from what begins to emerge as his philosophy, as far as I am concerned, judging from his pronouncements in Atlantic Canada in recent months. I refer to his apparent feeling that everything that is big, or anything that can be said to be owned by people of some wealth, is wrong. One has only to look at some of the speeches he has made down there to find excellent reason for believing that that is his basic philosophy.

If it were true that the removal of this facility is going to hurt only the processors, and perhaps make them dig down into their own pockets, I do not think I would be greatly concerned. If, in fact, they are able to do this, and they are the only ones to benefit from the laboratory, I suppose one would not be able to quarrel so very much with someone's saying, "Well, let them do it." But that, honourable senators, is not the case at all. What is the good of the fishermen going down to the sea and bringing home the fish if the fish cannot be efficiently processed, or cannot be marketed? Anyone who thinks that it is not going to help the fisherman himself to have this kind of facility is, to my mind, labouring under a grave misapprehension, and I think that is the case with the Minister of Fisheries.

I am reluctant to take such direct issue with my good friend and colleague, Senator Graham, and I know that he said what he did in good faith, believing that the Minister of Fisheries was right, but I just think it is so completely wrong that I could not let the matter pass without expressing an opposite opinion.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I understand that the honourable senator is going to clarify a statement he made in answering Senator Smith?

Senator Graham: That is correct. I hope I did not mislead honourable senators. I tried to make the point in my preamble, with respect to the development of fisheries in Canada, particularly in relation to research, that I did express concern to the minister, but that he pointed to developments which led me to believe that indeed, in the overall, research in the fishing industry in Canada is increasing, and that since the introduction of the 200-mile limit in 1977 the Department of Fisheries has added 125 man-years and more than $14 million to marine and fisheries research; so the research is not disappearing, but expanding.

The second point I tried to make was that in the minister's judgment—and I am sure that the financial statements of the industry would verify this fact—the profitability of the industry is improving, and he believes that part of this research should be carried on by the industry now that it is in a position to do so. Indeed, he expressed his willingness to aid in any transition difficulties the fishing industry may encounter in respect of the expansion of research.

Finally, with respect to the facility at Halifax, I did not say that a final decision has been made, but I did say that the matter was still under review. I said that the minister had given that undertaking, and a final decision had not yet been made.

Senator Flynn: There is nothing new there.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I do not know, honourable senators, if anything I can say can make any difference, in the light of the discussion we have just had, but I do, with the consent of the house, just wish to say that the single point I am making is that anything which contributes to the efficiency of the processing and marketing of fish is good for the fishermen, and that, essentially, is the type of work that is done by the laboratory in Halifax.

Motion agreed to, and the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne adopted.

On motion of Senator Langlois, ordered that the Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by the Honourable the Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 7, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to outline the work for next week in the Senate, dealing first with committees.

On Tuesday at 2 p.m. there will be an in camera meeting of the Special Committee of the Senate on Retirement Age Policies, and at 2.30 p.m. the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will meet in camera to examine the estimates of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has scheduled a meeting for 9.30 a.m. on Wednesday to consider Bill S-5, to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act. The committee may also consider Bill S-4, respecting Canadian non-profit corporations, should that bill be referred before the Wednesday meeting. Also on Wednesday the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline will meet in camera when the Senate rises.

On Thursday the Special Committee of the Senate on Retirement Age Policies will hold another in camera meeting at 9 a.m.; the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will consider banking legislation at 9.30 a.m.; and the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will meet again in camera on the DREE estimates.

It may be necessary to curtail the sitting of the Senate Wednesday afternoon because of committee work.

In the Senate we shall continue with the debate on Bill S-4 and the consideration of the first report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution. It is possible that at least one bill will come to us next week from the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to.

SAFE CONTAINERS CONVENTION BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Petten moved the third reading of Bill S-3, to implement the international convention for safe containers.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA NON-PROFIT CORPORATIONS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill S-4, respecting Canadian non-profit corporations.

He said: Honourable senators, it will be recalled that last year we had before us and passed a bill respecting Canadian non-profit corporations. The history of that bill is that it was introduced in the Senate, given second reading and then went to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, where it received a thorough examination, and some 25 amendments were made to it. The bill was then brought back to the Senate and received third reading, was passed and sent to the other place. In the other place it was not dealt with, partly because Parliament was prorogued. This being a new session, that bill has now gone.

The new bill before us, Bill S-4, contains the bill as passed by the Senate during the last session of Parliament, together with some other amendments. Those amendments are not of substance or of policy, but are rather of a technical nature, and arise in a way that I will explain in a moment or two. Because of the amendments that are now in this bill that were not before us at the last session, if and when the bill receives second reading I will be asking that it be sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for detailed study.

The old bill was introduced in December 1977. It was returned to the house from the committee in the spring of 1978, and after that time, notwithstanding the hearings provided by the committee to the various groups and organizations making representations, and notwithstanding the amendments the Senate made, further representations were made on certain technical points, matters of clarification, and so on. I could probably be excused for describing those amendments as minor, but I have been around this institution and another closely related institution for long enough to be cautious and wait until they are looked at in detail. However, I believe them to be of a very minor nature.

In saying that I think this present bill should go to committee, I believe that the experience with its preceding bill last year raises an interesting point that should be mentioned. It does show the desirability for an orderly process in handling legislation. As I go through the detail of these technical amendments, it is interesting to see the type of minor omissions from the bill as we passed it that have been picked up in the interval. The point I am making here may be a side issue, but it is that it may be a good thing in the legislative process not to deal with a bill quickly, in two or three days, but to have it lying around for a while before one or other of the houses of Parliament deals with it.

The idea that legislation on important, technical and complex subjects such as this should always go through as quickly as the two houses of Parliament can debate and pass it is, to me, not a responsible view of the treatment Parliament should accord legislation. I could not help but note that in connection with this bill, the amendments made since we dealt with the old bill are, in my view, all improvements, and are, although of a minor nature, the kind of improvements that should be made to any bill before we make it the law of the land. It has been my experience that once a bill becomes the law of the land it does not get reviewed and amended quickly.

I hope honourable senators will forgive me for making that, if you like, side interjection in my remarks when asking for this bill to be given second reading. The bill itself is, I think, a credit to the work of the Senate, and I hope it will commend itself to all honourable senators. I accordingly ask for your support for second reading of the bill.

Senator Molson: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Were the suggested amendments and the points raised in the Senate committee incorporated in the new bill?

Senator McIlraith: Yes. There were 25 of them, some being relatively substantial. There has been no change in them, and they are all in the new bill.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, whether my learned friend comes in sideways, frontways or any other way, he has clearly described the situation with respect to this bill, as he has with others. I entirely agree with what he has suggested. There is no point in discussing the bill further on second reading. All the amendments are technical or grammatical, and I subscribe to his suggestion that the bill should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I would just like to make a comment on what Senator McIlraith called his "side interjection". He apologized for it. However, it seems to me that he did need to apologize, because he was making a very essential point.

What I understood him to say was that the passage of this bill back and forth through the two houses to its present state has indicated that there can be very great value in some delay as opposed to—to use another of his phrases—"the hurrying through of legislation."

I think we in this chamber have been guilty of a good deal of hurrying through of legislation when the hurrying through has not been necessary. At times I think we have fallen into the habit of saying too often, "With leave and notwithstanding . . ." We have almost got into the habit of forgetting the reasons for the normal delays between first, second and third readings. We sometimes forget that the purpose of those deliberate legislative delays is to let those who may be affected by a bill have an opportunity of knowing that certain legislation is proposed.

In this particular case, as Senator McIlraith has pointed out, amendments were made by the Senate committee and then by the Senate itself after a thorough examination. In spite of that, as a result of subsequent representations by those interested or affected by the bill, other amendments have been made in the bill and they are primarily good and useful amendments.

This should be a lesson to us collectively in the Senate that we may very often make a mistake when we follow this habit of hurrying through legislation. I am not now referring to those occasions towards the end of a series of sittings, whether it be a holiday, the end of a session, and so on. That is a special case. It is not a case which justifies it, but it is a special case. However, in the ordinary routine of business, we do tend to see virtue in hurrying through when, as this bill indicates, there may very well be greater virtue in taking our time and giving bills that sober second thought on which we so often pride ourselves.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 7, at 8 p.m.

THE LATE HON. JOHN JAMES GREENE, P.C.

TRIBUTE

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I rise for a few minutes to speak about the late Senator Joe Greene. I was unable to pay my tribute to him before this evening, because I have spent the last two weeks away from the Senate on public business.

I knew Joe Greene best in his role as my minister in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Joe was a fine leader. He was imaginative, energetic, witty, and he was someone with whom you could have a violent Irish kind of argument for five minutes, and then you would find his arms around you and yours around him. It was a remarkable experience to serve Joe Greene.

I was with Joe in Japan when a stroke felled him in September, 1971. He was leading a government mission that was of great importance to Canada. He was totally dedicated to the work of that mission. His wife was with him. It was a great tragedy to see him felled.

All honourable senators know that the flame of life burned brightly inside the fragile shell that was Joe Greene. He never lost his will to live or his enjoyment of life. I wish to offer my sympathy to his wife, Corinne, and family and to tell them they can take great pride in the type of man that Joe was.

UNITED NATIONS

INTERNATIONAL YEAR OF THE CHILD, 1979

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I should like to call your attention to the fact that the General Assembly of the United Nations has proclaimed 1979 the International Year of the Child.

I am sure honourable senators are deeply concerned that, in spite of all efforts, millions of children in developing countries are undernourished, are without access to adequate health services, are missing the basic educational preparation for their future and are deprived of the elementary amenities of life.

We are aware that in developed countries certain children, in particular those who are physically and mentally handicapped, or socially disadvantaged, require additional protection and care.

I would hope that the governments of all countries will seize the opportunity of 1979 to take measures to meet the manifold needs and rights of the child and will draw public attention to them.

I would call upon the governments of all developed countries to support the expansion of basic services for children in developing countries as part of development plans of 1979 and following years.

Finally, I would urge all national groups to promote support by their governments for the work of the national committees of UNICEF and of the national commissions for the International Year of the Child, where these have been set up in their respective countries.

THE CONSTITUTION

THE GOVERNMENT'S INTENTION RESPECTING THE SENATE— QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. I would refer him to a reply given to the Leader of the Opposition in the other place by the Prime Minister, as reported at page 720 of the House of Commons Debates of Thursday, November 2, 1978. I must say that the answer did not really reply to the question. The exchange between the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister was as follows:

MR. CLARK: Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether he and his government have dropped the July 1, 1979, deadline for all or any aspects of what the former Bill C-60 referred to as phase one?

MR. TRUDEAU: That was not asked of me by any of the premiers either publicly or privately.

I want to emphasize what comes next. The Prime Minister continued:

I myself announced that we would not want to proceed with the provisions of Bill C-60 which cover the Senate unless we had the unanimous consent of the provinces.

Would the Leader of the Government confirm that it is the government's position not to proceed with the proposition in Bill C-60 respecting the abolition of the Senate and its replacement by a House of the Federation, or any similar provision without the unanimous consent of the provinces, as mentioned in the reply of the Prime Minister?

That is my first question. If such is the case, does the government intend to continue with its referral to the Supreme Court of the question whether it can proceed unilaterally with these provisions, since if the government adopts the attitude that it will require the unanimous consent of the provinces such referral will be irrelevant and useless?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, because of the importance of the question I will take it as notice and attempt to have an explanation and amplification of the Prime Minister's statement available tomorrow afternoon.

Senator Flynn: I thought it was very clear. The reply is very clear. I am surprised that the leader should need some explanation from the Prime Minister.

Senator Perrault: We on this side always strive for as much lucidity and accuracy as possible.

Senator Flynn: When it is lucid and you try to make it more lucid you are probably going to blur the whole question.

[Senator Bonnell.]

REMEMBRANCE DAY

OBSERVANCE BY POST OFFICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question respecting the justifiable protest by the Newfoundland-Labrador Command of the British Legion over the fact that the Post Office in that province will, by order, observe Remembrance Day, November 11, on November 13, which contravenes the federal Holidays Act and the Newfoundland Remembrance Day Act. Would the Leader of the Government investigate this complete lack of patriotism and make demands of the other place and the government he represents to rescind that order, which is against all that Canada stands for?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only report that in addition to the honourable senator's observations, a number of hard-working representatives from the Atlantic provinces who serve on the government side brought this question to my attention very early this morning. Hopefully an answer will be forthcoming shortly. If the facts are as stated, certainly they are disturbing.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Would the Leader of the Government also ascertain why it is that these people in the Post Office are so suddenly seized with the desire to work on any day?

Senator Marshall: I should like to ask a further supplementary question to help the Leader of the Government, as a result of my investigative follow-up. Would he ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs or the Postmaster General to refer to the Holidays Act, 1970, which proclaimed Dominion Day, Remembrance Day and Victoria Day, under R.S., c. 237, s.1, and also Chapter H-7 of 1970, which amended the Holidays Act, which is every proof that they are contravening the patriotism of Canada under the order that was issued?

Senator Perrault: The matter is under very careful scrutiny at this moment, and I hope to have a reply shortly.

● (2020)

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EGYPT-ISRAEL PEACE TREATY—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether it is anticipated that Canada will be involved in any of the adjustments necessary as a result of the Camp David Accords, or, more specifically, the expected Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty?

At the same time I should like to say that Prime Minister Begin's visit to Canada is very welcome and timely.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is not possible at this time to provide a reply to that question. I shall take it as notice.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

RECONSTITUTION OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether it is the intention of the government to reconstitute the Special Joint Committee on the National Capital Region. If so, why the delay? If this is not the government's intention, I would ask why it is not.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I regret that I do not have the requested information at my desk this evening. I will take that question as notice.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE UNDER DISASTER FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he has any information with respect to the request by the Province of British Columbia for assistance under the Disaster Financial Assistance Program, which is a federal-provincial agreement providing for federal assistance when requests are made by provinces under certain circumstances?

Honourable senators may appreciate knowing that west-central British Columbia has received almost 12 inches of continuous rain, has suffered from great flooding, and, amongst other damage, the main line of the Canadian National Railway has been severed and cannot be repaired for approximately five weeks.

Senator Perrault: Fortuitously, I have an answer to that question.

At 1 o'clock Monday, Premier Bennett sent a telex to the Prime Minister saying it was apparent that the flood situation in the Terrace-Kitimat area has caused damage to the public sector alone in excess of $2.5 million. Therefore, the province of British Columbia will be making claims under the Disaster Financial Assistance Program which provides for cost-sharing to a prescribed formula between federal and provincial governments in disaster situations.

Honourable Senator Austin may be aware that this is an automatic procedure. Once such a request is made by a provincial government, this schedule goes into effect immediately, although the actual damage figure could take many months to ascertain.

Under this formula the first dollar per capita is paid entirely by the Government of British Columbia. In this case, that amounts to $2.4 million. The next $2 per capita of damage is equally shared by the two governments. As the amount required rises, the federal government picks up a progressively higher share.

My information about the situation is that power and telephone services have been almost fully restored, and people who heat their homes with oil or electricity face no immediate problem. However, a major natural gas pipeline was severed in the Tewkla Pass area and will take some time to repair. For immediate emergencies requiring massive assistance, the provincial attorney general could have requested assistance from the Department of National Defence, but he decided this was not warranted.

I have additional information, but time will not permit me to provide it at this time. I appreciate the opportunity to reply in this full manner.

THE CONSTITUTION

RECONSTITUTION OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: I should like to give notice to the Leader of the Government that I shall ask the following question tomorrow: Is the government interested in reconstituting the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MCDONALD ROYAL COMMISSION—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question relating to that ongoing enterprise frequently referred to as the "McDonald inquiry" into certain activities of some of the security forces of Canada.

I have been informed that there is constantly appearing before the commission individual solicitors for two former ministers of the Crown whose conduct is apparently the subject of some inquiry. I would like to know whether this is true, if so, whether these lawyers are being paid at public expense, and, if they are, why?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question requires a detailed answer, and I do not have the information available. A question of that kind is one which could be asked and answered better in written form. However, I shall endeavour to provide the information when it becomes available.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I thank the honourable senator for informing me that he could write the answer. I gave him the credit for being able to write, in any event.

THE ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I would ask the government leader a question on another subject which is related to some of the documents the leader tabled this evening relating to the so-called anti-inflation program. Can he tell the house what was the rate of inflation at the time the program began and what is the rate of inflation now?

Senator Perrault: The current figure, honourable senators, I do not have immediately available, but it is good to know that unemployment dropped to 8.2 per cent last month and our trading surplus was over $600 million in the month of September alone.

Senator Smith (Colchester): It is good to note the irrelevance with which the honourable gentleman can approach any question. It would be more interesting, however, to note that he either has an answer to the question, or the prudence to say that he does not know the answer but will find out.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the continuing attack by certain people in this country on the integrity of the Canadian economy is really not helpful to Canadians anywhere. When we talk about inflation, let me remind honourable senators that Canada has had one of the most successful fights against inflation of any industrialized country in the world, and has consistently been among the top half dozen out of 150 nations in the world. Recently, a leading world organization rated Canada number two in terms of quality of life in the world, and most Canadians would rate it as number one. So why this persistent effort by members of the opposition to denigrate the remarkable recovery under way in this country today?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Why the continuing assault on the efforts of Canadian working people and industries to improve the economy of this country—a process that is succeeding? This pessimism and negativism are some of the reasons why certain parties have never been entrusted with power in Canada for long terms in our history.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, once again I congratulate the honourable gentleman on his ability to make a speech on anything that does not relate to the question that is put to him. All I asked him was a perfectly innocent question. What was the rate of inflation when the anti-inflation program began, and what is the rate now? If he was not ashamed to answer it, he would not have permitted himself to launch into this particularly irrelevant dissertation.

An Hon. Senator: That is irrelevant.

Senator Smith (Colchester): The honourable gentleman was irrelevant for a long time and very vigorously, and I think I am entitled to be irrelevant for an equally long time and, if I can be, as vigorously.

The honourable gentleman is like some others I could name of his ilk, so nervous about their position in the eyes of the people of Canada that they begin to be entirely too sensitive about any question which relates to their performance—if one can call it that—as a government. I think it is indeed indicative of the weakness and the feeling of utter defensiveness on the part of the Leader of the Government and his colleagues that they have to resort to this type of irrelevant, loud and noisy dissertation whenever a straightforward question is asked on the state of the economy—in this particular instance, on the rate of inflation now as compared with the rate on a certain date in the past.

● (2030)

Senator Perrault: Well, while the honourable senator may describe a report on the improvement in the Canadian economy as irrelevant, I do not think it is irrelevant to most Canadians. Be that as it may, if the honourable senator wishes to discuss the question of inflation and Canada's performance in relation to other countries of the world, and particularly Canada's performance this year in comparison with five or six years ago, he may wish to place the subject on the order paper by way of an inquiry. The government would welcome such an initiative. We could then have a full debate in the Senate on the subject of inflation and Canada's economic performance.

The recent improvement in our economic performance is something which is heartening to many—indeed, to most—Canadians. I would have thought that even members of the party which the honourable senator purports to represent would find joy in such a development.

Senator Smith (Colchester): My, my, my; what a troubled or guilty conscience will drive a person to!

Let me repeat: I simply asked how the rate of inflation today compared with the rate of inflation that prevailed at the time that anti-inflation controls were imposed. And what do I find? I find the honourable gentleman so inflated with something that he desires to convert the answer to that question into a long-winded dissertation.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

Senator Smith (Colchester): There is obviously something very severely gnawing at his sense of responsibility.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I hear some shouts from honourable senators opposite. They did not shout when the honourable senator took up a very substantial amount of time with completely irrelevant remarks.

Senator McDonald: Ask the question.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I did ask the question.

Senator McDonald: If it has been asked, sit down.

Senator Smith (Colchester): The honourable senator obviously has not been listening. I asked my question about 20 minutes ago. Most of the time since then has been taken up by the Leader of the Government evading it.

My question is: What was the rate of inflation when anti-inflation controls were imposed, and what is the rate of inflation now?

It is a perfectly simple, straightforward question. It could be answered either by the Leader of the Government giving the figures if he has them or, if not, by simply stating, as he has done so many times this evening, that he will make the appropriate inquiries and find out precisely what the figures are.

Senator McDonald: You give us the answer.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I do not know the answer. I am asking the Leader of the Government. After all, it is his duty to know and to provide that information.

As to the intervention of the honourable gentleman, it allows me to break into this irrelevant discussion and congratulate him upon his election to a very important post this evening.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have the current figures immediately at hand. An appropriate inquiry will go forward tomorrow. However, it seems to me infinitely more important to discuss the question of inflation in the form of a debate than it is to simply produce statistics—statistics which are not immediately available.

Senator Flynn: That is all you need to say.

Senator Perrault: However, as I have said, I challenge the honourable senator to put the subject on the order paper for debate, and we can then determine and better judge Canada's economic performance.

Senator Flynn: Why didn't you simply give that answer in the first place? Honourable senators were calling for order. Senator Robichaud was calling for the question.

The culprit in this matter, to my mind, was the Leader of the Government. Instead of simply saying that he did not know what the figures were and undertaking to find out, he wanted to speak about something else. It is the Leader of the Government who is responsible for the fact that this discussion has been irrelevant and out of order for the last 15 minutes.

Senator Perrault: The question was irrelevant.

Senator Flynn: You are responsible for the fact that this discussion has been irrelevant and out of order for the last 15 minutes.

Senator Lafond: You are the judge.

Senator Flynn: I am the judge? Indeed, I am! Can you contest it?

Senator Sparrow: Would the Leader of the Government take the question as notice and answer it at a later date? Would he take it as notice now?

Senator Flynn: Yes, certainly he would.

Senator Sparrow: Would he answer that question later? I think that is what is being asked. It is just whether the rate of inflation is different as between those two periods of time. That seems to me to be a question, and this is the Question Period, I believe. Perhaps he would agree to answer the question at a later date.

Senator Perrault: That information will be sought, yes. The question will be taken as notice, but the honourable senator, I hope, would want a far fuller discussion of the question of inflation and not merely the production of figures.

Senator Flynn: Order! Order!

Senator Perrault: You stay where you are, honourable senator.

Senator Flynn: Order!

Senator Perrault: You must learn to writhe sitting down.

Senator Flynn: Order! Resume your seat when you have nothing to say.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I do not wish to prolong this much longer, but the Honourable Leader of the Government knows that if he wants a debate on inflation he can institute it himself whenever he likes. So far as challenges go, let him challenge himself. He will find no reluctance here to discuss the question of inflation. He will find no reluctance here to acknowledge any slight improvement there has been in the economy of Canada, if indeed there has been any.

Senator Sparrow: Will he take the question as notice, and answer it later? Is that what we are trying to establish?

Senator Asselin: Are you suggesting you will take the question as notice yourself?

Senator Sparrow: No, I am simply asking if the Leader of the Government will take it as notice.

Senator Asselin: Then you will have to wait all evening to find out.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

CHANGE IN WRIT OF ELECTION—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: In view of the exchanges which have taken place in the last few minutes, may I pour a little oil on the troubled waters by asking a question which I am afraid is a matter of sheer curiosity? I am afraid this is another instance where the Leader of the Government will have to say that he will take the question as notice, but it has been drawn to my attention that in the revised Statutes of Canada the form for the writ of election in the Canada Elections Act ends up with the words:

WITNESS, Our Right Trusty and Well-beloved—

The Right Honourable Jules Léger.

—GOVERNOR GENERAL AND COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF (or Administrator of the Government) OF CANADA.

However, in section 63, Schedule I, of chapter 3 of the Statutes of 1977-78, the amending act passed last session, approximately the same form is used, but starts off with the writ of election using the words "Deputy of the Governor General." That is an innovation. Then at the bottom it says "Witness," and there is a blank, "Deputy of Our Right Trusty and Well-beloved . . . Chancellor and Principal Companion of Our Order of Canada," and the rest of it.

I cannot help wondering why it is that the Deputy of the Governor General in this writ has been substituted for the Governor General, who always figured as the Witness, so-called, in the previous statute, and I think, if my memory serves, in other statutes of this sort time out of mind.

I would be interested to know why this very curious change was made in the statute last year. I confess I should have noticed it at the time the bill was going through and raised the question, but I am afraid I was somewhat preoccupied with another bill which was brought down by the government on which I have had perhaps rather too much to say.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no information on that point, and I must take the question as notice.

Senator Flynn: You might refer it to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the First Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would yield to Senator Forsey, who, I understand, is prepared to speak.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (2040)

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I confess that I rise with some disappointment, but with rather less trepidation than I should have felt otherwise, because I supposed that the Honourable Senator Flynn was going to open the ball tonight, and I have looked forward to beginning my own remarks by a warm and heart-felt eulogy of the depth, the penetration, the eloquence, the wit, and the enormous and encyclopedic knowledge which he would have displayed. Indeed, I had been intending to begin my remarks in French, but to change to English with the quotation from that familiar verse:

And still they gaz'd, and still the wonder grew,
That one small head could carry all he knew.

Now I must revise the beginning of my speech and, as I say, I feel rather less trepidation because nobody will now be able to say how dull, how mediocre, how ill-informed and how generally disappointing my speech was by comparison with that of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition. I only hope that after what I have said about the speech he might have made, he will make that speech and I shall be able to applaud with the vigour which I customarily accord to his deliverances in this house.

Senator Flynn: I do not think I will make the speech at all now.

Senator Forsey: I turn now to the substance of this matter. I hesitate somewhat to say that I think this is a very valuable report and a very well-considered report because I was myself a member of the committee and might be supposed to be taking some credit for the content of the report and for the phrasing. The fact of the matter is that, as I sat in that committee, I was more and more impressed all the time by the knowledge, the astuteness, the good sense, the judgment, and the wisdom of my colleagues and, as I said to various members of the committee, I felt humbled because over and over again they brought out points which had simply never occurred to me, and I felt like kicking myself and saying, "Well, why didn't you think of that? Why didn't you think of raising that point? Why didn't you spot that particular defect in the bill?

Why did you not think of that particular suggestion for improving it?" I think we had in that committee a very remarkable example of the enormous reservoir that we have in this house of political, administrative, legal and business experience which can be brought to bear on almost any of the great variety of problems which come before us. I feel that committee gave a splendid demonstration of just how valuable and how effective this house can be and how necessary it is that we should have an upper house which will perform at least as well as this house has done and is doing.

I have been at pains whenever I have spoken on the subject of the late and, as far as I am concerned, unlamented Bill C-60—it now lies mouldering in the grave and one hopes that its soul will not go marching on—to point out that I thought there was scarcely a single member of the Senate whose attitude towards that part of the bill which dealt with the upper house was that the present Senate, as it stands, is perfect; that it is the Ark of the Covenant upon which none may lay unholy hands.

I have emphasized that over and over again suggestions have been forthcoming, sometimes very drastic suggestions, from members of this house for the improvement and the reform of this chamber. I have also been at pains to point out that, at the request of the Leader of the Government some considerable time ago—away back last year—members of the Liberal Party in this house were asked to put down in writing their suggestions for improvement in the house, and a great many of us did. I saw quite a list of these things. I do not know if I saw them all. They were forwarded, I understand, to the Prime Minister. As far as I know, that is the last that has ever been heard of them.

I very much welcome the decision that the committee should proceed to a thorough study of the composition of the upper house and proposals for its improvement. Most of us, I believe, could produce a number of proposals. Most of us, I think, would be inclined to say that there ought to be some guaranteed minimum number of opposition senators in this house. A good many of us, I think, would support the proposal of the Joint Committee on the Constitution six years ago that half of the members of the house should be appointed by the central government from lists submitted by the provincial governments. This would enable the central government to eliminate from the lists which would be provided to it by the provincial governments people who were utterly useless or people who were obviously dedicated hatchetmen sent here to prevent the legislative machinery of the country from operating.

I have sometimes sketched a possible procedure when the Government of Canada received a list of nominations from a provincial government. The government here would look at the list and say, "Number one? Oh dear, he won't do at all. Good man in his day, but he has been getting very, very feeble in the head recently. He is really of not much account in the province except as a nuisance. He just won't do at all. Number two? Wait a minute—isn't this the chap that was in the penitentiary a few years ago for embezzlement? No, we can't very well have him. Number three? Ah, a woman—point one. Point two:

her mother is French Canadian. Point three: one of her grandmothers was an Inuit. Point four: One of her grandfathers was a Ukrainian. Point five—or perhaps this should be point one: she has been extraordinarily active in all sorts of good causes and community enterprises; she is very able; and she is very highly respected. This is the one!”

You could clear out the deadwood from the list. You could clear out the pirates, the provincially dedicated hatchetmen, and you would get a much more representative body with a much wider spectrum of opinions than we have here now. I say this with all due respect to what I think is the very high quality of the members of this house at the present time. Still, I think that is one possible improvement.

Other people have suggested, of course, a term appointment of perhaps six or ten years. Some have suggested that the appointment should be renewable. Others of us have had some doubts about that because we fear that human nature being somewhat feeble, sometimes a senator whose term was about to be renewed might be casting an apprehensive glance over his shoulder and saying, “Well, I don’t much like this particular piece of legislation, but I should very much like to be reappointed, so perhaps I had better be a good boy and stifle any misgivings that I have about it.” I hope that anyone appointed for a term would be above such human failings, but I should like to be a little surer of it than I am. These have been some of the reforms suggested.

Then, of course, there have been other suggestions repeatedly, and I think they are becoming more marked now. I notice that this particular suggestion has recently been endorsed with great fervour by the Honourable Senator Buckwold in a speech to the Canadian Club in Saskatoon. The suggestion was for internal reform which would involve no constitutional change but might, to a considerable degree, transform this chamber. This suggestion amounts substantially to this: that there would remain, of course, a Leader of the Government in the Senate who would be a member of the ministry and a Leader of the Opposition. There would also be, elected by the senators, a Leader of the Senate who would be able to talk turkey to the cabinet and say, “If you send us a bill like that at the last moment, if you impose upon us Christmas or Easter closure, you will not get away with it. The Senate will take its time, and a proper amount of time, to consider this bill and if you don’t like it, you can lump it.” No minister is in a position to do that. However hard our present Leader of the Government fights for us in the cabinet, he is almost bound to be overborne by the weight of members and by the weight of the prestige of the other place. But if we had a leader elected by the senators themselves, he would be in an independent position and could take this sort of line with, I think, some real effect.

Another part of this bundle of suggestions is that the whips should be taken off, that there should be no whips in the upper house. Senator Buckwold, in his speech, remarked that there had been times when he had voted as he did not wish to vote on certain measures because of pressure from the whips. Well, as far as I am concerned, of course, this rolls off me like water off a duck’s back, because I think it has already been evident on several occasions here that I pay no attention whatever to the whips. I vote as I see fit on each measure and I have indeed not only voted but spoken with some vigour against government measures when I thought they were foolish, ill-timed, ill-considered or dangerous.

But, on the other hand, it is quite clear that there are some honourable senators who with perhaps a lifelong or even a hereditary devotion to their party will, in spite of misgivings, “vote just as their leaders tell ‘em to”, if I may quote Gilbert and Sullivan.

Those are some of the suggestions that have been made for reform. There are plenty of others. There have even been suggestions for making the Senate an elected body, an idea which I am not very much enamoured of, I must confess, because if you made it an elected body and gave it real power, then it would promptly become a rival of the House of Commons and you would have a succession of dogfights, death grapples, between the two houses. You might even have a repetition here of what happened in Australia three years ago, when an elected Senate forced out of office a government with a clear majority in the lower house. I can’t believe that any House of Commons in Canada, or any government in its right mind, would contemplate such a thing.

The answer to that, of course, is “Well, you could give the elected Senate very few and small powers.” I don’t think this would work, because I think that the people who want to have an elected Senate—notably, perhaps, some of the provinces—would not be satisfied with a body which was merely a sort of debating society or an advisory committee. They would insist that an elected Senate should have very wide powers, and the wider the powers it had, the more it would be tempted to set itself up as a rival of the House of Commons. The wider the powers it had, the more these senators, with the enormous political clout which they would enjoy, would puff out their chests, wave their arms, wave their fists and say, “You think you are the representatives of the people—you in the other place. We represent the people just as much as you do, and perhaps more so,” especially, of course, if they were elected by a province-wide vote, and they could then proceed to look down their noses at mere members of the House of Commons elected by a constituency of perhaps, at the outside, 85,000, 90,000 or 100,000, when a senator from Ontario, elected by the whole province, could say, “I represent millions of electors.”

Anyway, the Senate committee will, I think, consider all these and many other suggestions, and, I think, with a completely open mind; not without certain convictions, but open to argument, open to persuasion.

I may remark in passing that—I can’t say who it was who said this to me—but honourable senators may be interested to know that one day when I was walking out of the joint committee of the two houses on Bill C-60 a very prominent member of the lower house, who is no friend of the Senate, said to me this, unsolicited, spontaneously: “I have been impressed by the contributions to this committee of the Senate members of the committee, and I acquit the senators absolutely of any charge of self-interest."

If I could say where that came from, I think you would agree it would be a case of "And e'en the ranks of Tuscany could scarce forbear to cheer." Unfortunately as it was a private conversation, I can't say where it came from, but I can tell you that it came from somebody who is certainly no friend of the Senate and who had evidently been impressed by the sheer quality and weight of the contributions that senators had made to the proceedings of that joint committee.

I think our own committee's report has, among other things, the merit of being couched in very careful and moderate terms. It makes certain points and makes them very firmly. But it does it in a way that I think nobody could call unduly provocative. I think it's perfectly evident—it was evident throughout the proceedings of the committee, and I think it's perfectly evident in the report—that the members of the committee approached their task without any trace of partisanship; and as one who sits, even if perhaps somewhat uneasily at times, on the government side, I should like to pay my heartfelt tribute to the members of the opposition on that committee who made most valuable contributions and without the slightest trace, that I could discover, of any partisanship whatever.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Forsey: I want to look at one or two—perhaps more than one or two—of the specific things that the committee said. It's a very comprehensive report, far more so than that of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. That committee made a valuable report, but confined itself almost entirely to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and on other matters twittered pleasantly and non-committally, but took no particular stand; whereas our committee's report, I think, is very definite, much more comprehensive, and on a variety of matters does take a very definite stand.

First of all, on the question of the position of the Queen and the Governor General, I think that our committee has made very sensible suggestions in a most unprovocative way. It suggests even certain amendments—but, of course, without going into detail; and I think it's safe to say that consequential amendments might be required in the redrafting of the bill.

One of the recommendations it makes removes any necessity for a specific recommendation on that extraordinary part of clause 48(2), I think it was, which says, in a phrase of insufferable condescension, that when the Queen is in Canada she would not be "precluded" from exercising the powers of the Governor General.

I should personally have liked something a little more acid in it than what we get here, but I agree that when the committee had made its statement—this is an example of how unprovocative it was—when it had made its statement about the substantial amendment that was required, it removed the necessity for a specific comment of the somewhat acerbic kind that I have just indulged in on clause 48(2).

[Senator Forsey.]

I am glad to see that there is something in here about the necessity of providing some security of tenure for the Governor General. As honourable senators will doubtless recall, three years ago in Australia, the Governor General acted with great celerity in exercising his reserve power to dismiss the government of Mr. Whitlam; and I happen to know, from the manuscript of the book which Sir John Kerr has now written on this—and which I think will be appearing in print in Australia in a few days—I happen to know that in the course of the discussions that went on, at least once, if not twice, Mr. Whitlam said to him, "Well, it's a question of whether I'll sack you first or you'll sack me."

The fact of the matter is that if Mr. Whitlam had been just a little quicker on the draw, he might have recommended to the Queen the dismissal of Sir John Kerr, the Governor General, before Sir John Kerr could recommend the dismissal of Mr. Whitlam; and this would have completely frustrated the operation of responsible cabinet government in Australia, because the situation was that the upper house was refusing to pass a supply bill. It was going to leave the Government of Australia minus about 40 per cent of the funds which it required for carrying on the public business. The situation which would have resulted was described by some of Mr. Whitlam's own ministers as "economic collapse", "economic chaos". They have, apparently, in Australia nothing like our section 23, I think it is, of the Financial Administration Act providing for Governor General's Special Warrants, and Mr. Whitlam, unable to get supply, unable to get the money he needed, with no prospect whatever of getting it for months and months and months upon end, refused either to resign and make way for another government or to advise the dissolution either of the lower house or of the two houses, which, of course, there is provision for in the Australian Constitution.

It was, in my judgment, absolutely essential that the Governor General's reserve power to dismiss Mr. Whitlam for this unconstitutional conduct should be exercised, but it was a very close run thing, as the Duke of Wellington said of the Battle of Waterloo. It might easily have been that economic collapse or economic chaos might have supervened because the prime minister had managed to get in his recommendation—his advice—to the Queen to dismiss the Governor General before the Governor General could exercise the reserve power necessary to preserve parliamentary, responsible government in Australia.

So I think it is important that there should be, in any revised bill, some provision for security of tenure for the Governor General, so that he would be in a position to exercise his reserve, emergency powers to preserve parliamentary government—responsible, cabinet government—if the occasion arose. It is, of course, extremely unlikely that such an occasion would arise, but every now and again you do get some prime minister in some jurisdictions, at least, who loses his head completely, as Mr. Whitlam did, and it is necessary to have some kind of safeguard against this.

I may remark, in passing, that if it comes to that, we had an occasion in this country when a prime minister very nearly lost his wits in this matter. One week after the election of 1925, which returned 101 Liberals—the government party, Mr. Mackenzie King's party—out of a house of 245, and one month and two days before the new Parliament could legally come into existence, Mr. King claimed he had three courses open to him: one, to meet Parliament—correct—two, to resign—correct—three, to ask for an immediate second dissolution of Parliament before the new Parliament could even meet. Fortunately, he retained enough common sense not to invoke this third, supposed and, of course, completely subversive right, which would have amounted to constitutional abortion on demand. But that is an indication that even a statesman of the astuteness, shrewdness and experience of Mr. Mackenzie King, was capable of coming very close to losing his wits in such a matter, and it might easily have been necessary in those circumstances for the Governor General to say, "I am very sorry, Prime Minister, but if parliamentary government means anything at all, surely it must mean that a newly elected Parliament must at least be allowed to meet and see if it can transact business."

It is because of these considerations that I am so glad that the committee reported that there should be some provision for the security of tenure of the Governor General.

I am glad also that there appears in the committee's report a moderately stated but very clear and very firm repudiation of that extraordinary provision which got into the bill, heaven alone knows how, to the effect that a defeated Prime Minister, censured by the House of Commons, the subject of a vote of want of confidence by the House of Commons, should have the right, and indeed, as the bill was framed, even the duty, to advise the Governor General whether he, the defeated Prime Minister, should be called upon to form a new administration. When I read that provision of the bill I thought, to use the phrase of P. G. Wodehouse, as if my eyes had handed in their portfolio. I could scarcely believe that any such thing would get into a bill on constitutional revision, and I said, on more than one occasion, publicly, "Just fancy: a defeated Prime Minister prancing into Government House and saying, 'Well, Your Excellency, I have just been censured by the House of Commons. I now recommend that you commission me to form a new administration.'"

When I produced this in the presence of one of the bill's defenders from the other house, he said, airily, "Oh, that would be perfectly easily dealt with. The House of Commons would defeat him." I then said, "Yes, and then he would prance into Government House and say, 'Your Excellency, I have now been twice censured by the House of Commons. My claim to form a new administration is therefore now twice as strong as it was yesterday, or the day before, when I made my previous recommendation.'"

I am glad to see that that gets properly jumped on, even if in very careful and moderate terms, because it would be an affront to common sense, and utterly subversive of responsible cabinet government, and subversive of the powers of the House of Commons, and it would signally fail to measure up to the government's statement that provisions dealing with the executive were simply intended to state existing practice in contemporary terms.

I am delighted, also, to notice in the report the warning against excessive codification.

Senator Roblin: Hear, hear.

Senator Forsey: I think we English-speaking people have a tendency to be perhaps rather too wary, in many instances, of getting things down in black and white, as sometimes our French Canadian, and, I might add, our Scots, fellow citizens would prefer to do. I think we can learn in that respect. There are things that are not codified now that perhaps should be. I think, on the other hand, that it is very dangerous to go overboard with a loud splash in favour of codification of practically everything you can think of. Some people complain bitterly of what they call the silences—the gaps—in the British North America Act: the things that are not put down in black and white. I contend that those are among the greatest glories of the British North America Act, because they leave room for manoeuvre, for adaptation, for adjustment, for innovation, and for—and I quote a favourite phrase of mine which honourable senators have heard me use before, from Sir Robert Borden—"the exercise of the commonplace quality of common sense."

The report mentions only one of the difficulties about codifying everything in the way of customs, conventions and usages which form so large a part of our working Constitution now. There are others, and very serious ones. One is that if you codify a convention, custom or usage at the point it has reached at this particular moment, you freeze the thing, and you may be preventing very important and desirable changes.

Most of us, I think—well, perhaps that is too rash a statement—many of us, I think, would be inclined to say that at present the power of the executive, the power of the cabinet, and perhaps particularly the power of the Prime Minister, has reached a point almost unprecedented in history. Many of us, I think, would be inclined to say that the power of the Prime Minister has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished. The older ones among us might sigh for the days when Sir William Harcourt could say of the position of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom that it was "inter stellas luna minores," and I hope the classical scholars here will not accuse me of having garbled the quotation. I think it means, "a moon among minor stars." Well, clearly, now, the Prime Minister both in Great Britain and here is very much more than a moon among minor stars. He is almost the centre of the solar system of government.

I am not at the moment impugning in any way the exercise of this power by the present cabinet, or the present Prime Minister. That is not the point. The point is, we now have this enormous concentration of power in the executive, which is a matter of practice, and not a matter of strict law, and it is open to question whether we want to freeze the customs, usages and conventions of the Constitution at this particular point, and whether we want to prevent a later generation, or perhaps merely this generation a little later in time, from changing this, and giving back more power notably, of course, to the House of Commons, and perhaps even more power to a revising chamber like this one.

There is also, of course, the danger that if you codify these customs, conventions and usages, you make them justiciable. You put them in the courts, and instead of their being interpreted by the House of Commons, or by this house, or by both of them, or by public opinion and the movement of public opinion, through the political process, you have them thrown into the courts, where the judges might not have, really, any political experience or political savvy, and where, relying perfectly properly on the precise words of the statute, they would give a judgment which would simply throw the whole parliamentary system into chaos and which would cause pretty well everybody in the two houses of Parliament to say, "This is a completely impossible and ridiculous situation;" and if you had it written into the text of a fundamental law, you would be able to change it only by means of an amending formula which in this country is certain to be a complicated and difficult one—properly so—and it might take years and years and years to get the country out of the difficulties, the mess, this had involved; whereas if it is a matter of custom and the exercise of common sense and judgment by people accustomed to the political process, if a particular thing is not working well, it is perfectly easy to change the usage and say, "Well, this is a new situation. The old precedents and the old rules don't really apply and it has to be dealt with in a way required by the new situation."

Of course, you may have old precedents suddenly becoming relevant where for years they have been irrelevant. Take, for example, the rule that prevailed in Great Britain down to 1868 that no matter what the results of a general election, the government in office met the new parliament and let it decide. That was obviously necessary. The same thing was true in the rest of the Empire or Commonwealth. It was obviously necessary when you had a great many people elected as independents or more or less independents; what Sir John A. Macdonald used to call "loose fish", "shaky fellows", "waiters on providence"—people who, when the first results came in from the staggered elections, would cast an eye over their shoulders and see that the Conservatives seemed to be winning, and say, "Well, of course, I am an independent, really, but I have always been an independent Conservative." If, on the other hand, they saw the Liberals were winning, they would say, "Well, of course, I have always been an independent member, but independent Liberal, you understand."

If you look at the results of the first elections in this country, you will notice that the morning after an election the Conservative paper would announce that so many Conservatives had been elected, and the Liberal paper would say, "Oh no, that figure is wrong. So and so is really a Liberal." Well, as long as you had independent members—"loose fish", "shaky fellows", "waiters on providence"—loose fish who swam from side to side, as they often did in critical debates, it made sense to have a government meet the new house and see how the loose fish would behave.

Once you had highly organized parties and party discipline, this ceased to be relevant. But lo and behold, years and years afterwards, to the great discomfiture of old line politicians, the loose fish did not reappear, no, but loose shoals or schools of fish appeared and you had third parties and fourth parties, and a loose school or shoal of fish swam one way or the other, and it became possible, necessary and proper once again to do what Mr. Mackenzie King did after the election of 1925, meet the house and let it decide.

Senator Flynn: You mean 1945.

Senator Forsey: Oh, he was a little reluctant, as it turned out, to let it decide, but that is what he purported to be doing, at all events.

I am afraid some of my liberal colleagues will fear that at certain points the old Adam of my Conservative bringing up is peeping out. But, anyway, I think it is very important that the process of codifying should not go too far. It was obscure in this bill how far it was intended to go because clause 35, if I remember correctly, said that the country and all its institutions, including, presumably, provincial institutions, were to be governed by this Constitution and by the customs, conventions and usages "hallowed" by it.

Members of the committee will recall that we questioned the draftsmen about what they meant by this "hallowed". I said to them, "Are you proposing to have a group of bishops from various churches and moderators and other high potentates of various denominations assembled to pronounce some kind of incantation over certain, or all, of the customs, conventions and usages of the Constitution?" They rather shuffled their feet and cleared their throats and hummed and hawed, and we didn't get much of an answer. This is hardly surprising, especially because the French version there—as often—was much clearer than the English, and the French version didn't say anything about hallowing. I looked carefully for some phrase like "consacrés par cette constitution". The cupboard was bare. There was absolutely nothing there. It just said "les conventions, coutumes et usages"—point. That was it. No more.

Well, that was left very vague, and when we asked, "Would this make certain or all customs, conventions and usages justiciable?" I don't think we got a clear answer. It is a very important point. I am glad, therefore, that the warning is in here about the dangers of excessive codification.

The next thing I should like to point out is how easy the report is on the very narrow and limited powers of delay which the upper house would have. It mentions the 60-day veto which in itself is an extraordinary performance, especially as there is to be no reference back of the vetoed bill to the House of Commons. It was simply after 60 days to go slapdash through, straight to the Governor General for his assent. But they don't say anything about that extraordinary provision for cutting the period of delay down to seven days. True, this could only be done by the two-thirds vote of the House of Commons and only if the bill did not have "an obvious and significant impact on the relations between the federal authority and a provincial authority." This is one of those limpid and lapidary phrases of the bill which we are called upon to admire, in contrast to the dreadful obscurity and prosiness and ambiguities of the British North America Act. Only if it didn't have this "obvious and significant impact"—a "spongy" expression as a very eminent constitutional lawyer of my acquaintance (a lifelong Liberal, I might add) observed—and only if it was not of "especial linguistic significance"—another "spongy" expression—and only if the House of Commons by a two-thirds vote said it was urgent. But even so, there would have been circumstances in which, given a large enough vote in the House of Commons, you could have pushed this thing through in seven days. And, of course, the bill also in effect provided for closure and time limits in the upper house, so that the possibility of obstruction or filibustering was eliminated.

I think, therefore, the committee's report on this subject has been exceedingly moderate.

Senator Flynn: It was so obvious.

Senator Forsey: There are one or two other things I want to comment on. I am sorry there is nothing in here about that proposed double veto which the upper house was to have for measures of especial linguistic significance, and I hope that if that idea is resuscitated by the government, or is suggested by anybody else, the committee will give it a very careful examination because I think it is of very dubious value, to say the least, and might very easily lead to demagogic manoeuvres by extremists in French Canada or in English Canada. I think this business of having all of us classify ourselves as French-speaking or non-French-speaking could very easily lead to considerable difficulties. Whether a bill is or is not of especial linguistic significance is, for parliamentary purposes, to be clearly settled by the Speaker of the upper house. But that wouldn't, by any means, end the difficulty because you could perfectly well have a senator who, for good and sufficient reasons, seemed to the Speaker to be, let us say, English-speaking or French-speaking and who, by certain sections of the public, would not be admitted to be so.

Years ago I remember a discussion with Monsieur Michel Brunet, le professeur d'histoires—as the Prime Minister has called him—à l'Université de Montréal; a professor of history, but in French, with the plural, you can get a subtle distinction and a play on words which I might perhaps translate as "the professor of stories" in the University of Montreal. I remember that on that occasion Monsieur Brunet was complaining, not without some ground, of course, that on the boards of large and important companies there were no French Canadian directors. There weren't very many at the time, true. But there were what the ordinary innocent English-speaking Canadian like myself thought were some. So people mentioned a few names—among them, I remember, that of Aimé Geoffrion, the very great constitutional lawyer. Monsieur Brunet dismissed these airily with "Ce sont des anciens Canadiens français"—former French Canadians. In other words, they don't agree with me; therefore, they have lost their status as French Canadians. And I can imagine that there is at least one senator in this body with an undeniably French name, a very, very distinguished French name, belonging to a very fine old French family—and I might add of somewhat mixed, though highly honourable ancestry on both sides—who is so completely bilingual that he might put himself down on either side and the Speaker would scarcely dare to challenge him. The red-necks in certain parts of the country would say, "What! So-and-So, with a name like that? English-speaking? My eye and Betty Martin," not knowing the gentleman. On the other hand, the French-speaking people might say, "Well, his mother was Irish, his grandmother was Scotch and he married a lady with an English name. He is not a real French Canadian at all," and a vote might be carried one way or the other by the presence of these or other people of the same sort in one or the other category, and you would get almost infinite possibilities of difficulty and rumpus about this.

Some of us will recall how years ago, when Mr. St. Laurent was Prime Minister, someone, whom I think I should qualify as an extreme French Canadian nationalist, put up a questioner at a meeting to ask him which language he said his prayers in. I think my French Canadian colleagues will confirm what I say when I say that, I understand there is a proverb that in French one prays, one swears and one counts in one mother's tongue. They put this Johnny up to ask Mr. St. Laurent which language he said his prayers in. Mr. St. Laurent, being the soul of candour, said, "Why, in English of course. That is what my mother taught me." I understand that in certain of the back concessions some of these people went around saying, "You see? Louis St. Laurent, mais il prie en anglais. C'est un Anglais, ce n'est pas un Canadien français." He was not Canadien français pure laine at all. He was a very dubious character from that point of view.

If that kind of attack could have been made on a person of the eminence and transparent honesty and integrity of Mr. St. Laurent, the possibilities of demagogic appeal on these grounds are, I think, not negligible.

I hope any attempt to include this provision in any future constitutional legislation will be looked at with a very careful and sceptical eye. I think also there is the possibility that, far from protecting the rights of French-speaking minorities, it could very well be used to prevent the expansion of those rights.

Senator Flynn: Exactly.

Senator Forsey: That is a subject on which I feel very strongly. I am sure that many other members of the house who are themselves French Canadians would feel even more strongly than I. The assumption that this double veto will always work in favour of the French language minority is, in my judgment, a most dubious one. If you have proper safeguards written into your Charter of Rights and Freedoms, proper safeguards for the two linguistic minorities, English-speaking in Quebec and French-speaking outside Quebec, you do not need this kind of thing, it seems to me, and you can rely upon the good judgment of the upper house to behave reasonably.

Another feature of this peculiar proposal was, of course, that it could be overridden by a two-thirds majority in the House of Commons, which indeed seems to me to take away from it the last vestige of merit it might have as a protection for the French-speaking minority.

One point that has been made in reference to the table of possible composition of the upper house on the basis of the last preceding elections, which you will find on page 15 of the committee's report, is that you would not really get very quick changes in the composition of the upper house; that actually there would be only a very moderate shift now and again. Well, I'm not so sure about that, partly because, with the persistence of third parties, which now appear to be pretty well entrenched in all the provinces west of the New Brunswick border, and show signs of appearing even in my native province of Newfoundland, it seems to me you may very well get a succession of minority governments and a succession of elections over a very short period, and you might therefore have considerably more instability in the membership of this proposed upper house than some people have been inclined to suggest.

I think that is really just about all I want to say about the committee's report. I am afraid I have gone on at undue length, as is my unfortunate habit. I hope that I have for once not gone at such inordinate speed as to merit the rebuke I received in a letter this morning from a gentleman who had presided at a recent speech of mine, who said that my mind went so fast—that was all right as far as it went, I suppose, but what came afterwards was not so complimentary—that I failed to enunciate clearly and nobody could follow what I was saying. I made up my mind that tonight I would try to be more deliberate; I would try to avoid rivalling the machine-gun speed at which Mr. W. S. Fielding and Mr. R. B. Bennett used to speak, beside which my most rapid utterance is comparable to that of a snail. I decided to try to do that. How well I have succeeded I don't know.

I decided also that I should not comment on certain parts of the report where, to say the least, I have very little to add, more particularly in the case of the parts on the Supreme Court, where I might be ruled out as a non-lawyer speaking on something on which only the initiates of the legal profession should have much to say.

I want to make just one final remark. I hope that when the committee investigates the whole question of the future upper house, or the changed, reformed, altered, modified upper house, it will make good use of the long, interesting and cogent memorandum, which I think all members of the committee have—I sent it out broadcast—by Professor Kwavnick of Carleton University. It is couched in language which is far more picturesque than that of the committee's report, but I think it makes a number of very important points, and makes them very well indeed. They deserve to be very carefully considered by the committee in its further proceedings on the Constitution of a new or modified upper house.

I feel confident, honourable senators, that I have left out various things that I ought to have said and put in things that probably I ought not to have said, a little reminiscent, for those of us who have had an Anglican or semi-Anglican bringing up, of the General Confession:

We have left undone those things which we ought to have done; And we have done those things which we ought not to have done; And there is no health in us.

I am quite prepared to have anybody coming after me saying that I have left unsaid those things which I ought to have said and I have said those things which I ought not to have said, and there was little or no health in the observations which I have just inflicted upon your honours.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

THE GENTLEMAN USHER OF THE BLACK ROD—QUESTION

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Honourable Leader of the Government.

Since 1947, two very distinguished gentlemen in succession have occupied the position of Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, and they are Major C. R. Lamoureux, D.S.O., and Major A. G. Vandelac, M.C.

Major Vandelac, the present Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, was appointed by the Prime Minister. He was awarded the Military Cross for bravery at Dieppe with the Montreal Fusiliers.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Walker: He later fought in the Korean War with distinction with that great regiment, the Vingt-Deuxième. It is with regret that I say that he, because of his age, is about to retire.

Whereas the traditions of this high office since Confederation, coupled with the duties incidental to it, invite—yes, almost necessitate—the appointment of a military man, would the Leader of the Government ascertain from the Prime Minister whether we in this house can assume that the next Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod will also be a military man and, to rotate the position, an Anglophone Canadian?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the query will be conveyed to the office of the Prime Minister.

THE ECONOMY

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday, in his earnest quest for enlightenment, Senator Smith (Colchester) asked a series of questions on the subject of inflation.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Flynn: One question.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I asked one question.

Senator Perrault: Despite the fact that when I rose in my place to reply I stated, "The current figure, honourable senators, I do not have immediately available," I was subsequently accused of attempting to evade a reply.

Senator Flynn: Come on!

Senator Perrault: Such was not the case.

Senator Flynn: You are trying again.

Senator Perrault: I have, honourable senators, however, brought some explanatory material on the subject of inflation which I hope may satisfy the questing mind of the honourable senator.

Senator Flynn: Give the figures and let it drop.

Senator Perrault: In its report of one year ago the Anti-Inflation Board indicated that it was unlikely that demand pressures would develop in 1978 "in a manner which would lead to any acceleration of the rate of inflation." The Board warned, however, that "Food price forecasting is always a hazardous endeavour," and that "as yet the depreciation of the Canadian dollar on exchange markets has not been fully reflected in Canadian prices."

Senator Flynn: He did not ask that.

Senator Perrault: Over the past 12 months there has been a further decline in the value of the Canadian dollar. The impact of this change on the price of imported products was significant, particularly on food items whose prices had already risen as a result of bad weather and the effects of the beef cycle.

Senator Flynn: Oh!

Senator Perrault: As a result, the rise in the All Items Consumer Price Index—

Senator Flynn: Come on!

Senator Perrault: —over the 12 months ending in September was 8.6 per cent, slightly higher than the rise of 8.4 per cent in September last year, and only moderately better than the rise of 10.6 per cent at the same time in 1975 when the Anti-Inflation Program began.

The consistently high rate of increase of the CPI over the past two years has led many people to conclude that no progress has been made since 1975 toward coming to grips with the inflation problem. But the widespread use of the Consumer Price Index as the only indicator of inflation has, in the opinion of the Anti-Inflation Board, masked the significant improvement that has occurred.

Almost all indicators of price and cost changes for the Canadian economy show that the increases of the past year are well below those of 1975. The various indicators of price change other than the CPI suggest that prices have risen in the general range of 6.5 to 7.5 per cent to date this year, well down from the 10 to 12 per cent range of 1975.

I know this information is heartening to the Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester).

Despite the continued sharp deterioration in the value of the Canadian dollar and the resultant rise of 12.6 per cent in import costs, price changes in 1978 have been about the same as in 1977. This is a remarkable achievement, honourable senators. Without the depreciation of the dollar, domestic prices would have increased by far less than 6.5 to 7.5 per cent.

Indicators of cost increases also show improvement since 1975. To date, in 1978, unit labour costs are up 5.7 per cent, in comparison to 8.1 per cent in 1977—one of the best performances in the entire world. Indeed, there was an increase in unit labour costs of 15.3 per cent in 1975, so the advance has been dramatic. The improvement in unit labour costs has been steady during the past three years, reflecting the persistent deceleration in the rate of change of various indicators of compensation per employee. These compensation variables suggest an increase to date in 1978 of 5.5 per cent to 6.5 per cent, compared to increases of 8 to 10 per cent in 1977, 12 to 13 per cent in 1976, and 15 to 20 per cent in 1975.

I know that all honourable senators will take enormous heart from these encouraging facts, which indicate the success of certain government programs, policies and initiatives.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, once more the honourable gentleman has demonstrated his utter, absolute inability to answer a simple question with a simple answer, and particularly an accurate answer.

I cannot really tell from what he said which one of the many figures he quoted has any special significance with reference to the question. He referred to my mind as a "questing" mind, which I regard as an interesting observation. I must say, though, the tone of voice in which he used the word indicated that he did not regard it as a very complimentary term. I might say to him that I would rather have a questing mind than the type of wandering mind which cannot devote itself for more than a few seconds to a simple answer to a simple question.

As to the various excuses which he has offered for the fact that the rate of inflation is still unsuitably high, I can say to him that I pay no more attention to those bits of fantasy than I do to some of the other things he says on behalf of this wandering government.

The honourable gentleman, of course, will recognize that every time he makes a speech in answering a question, somebody else is entitled to make just as long a speech, and it would not be very hard to make just as good a one after he sits down.

I could perhaps end these remarks by drawing attention to the fact that he seemed to indicate that the decreased value of the dollar had something to do with inflation. He seemed to put that forward as an excuse for the present high rate of inflation. I simply ask him to remember who has been in office while the dollar lost its value, and then see if he can relate that to any satisfactory excuse for inflation.

Senator Asselin: Answer.

Senator Flynn: Another speech? Come on!

An Hon. Senator: Don't encourage him. He'll do it.

THE CONSTITUTION

THE GOVERNMENT'S INTENTION RESPECTING THE SENATE— QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Has the Leader of the Government a long reply to the question I put to him yesterday? It also is very simple and very clear. He probably has half an hour in which to answer that, which is contrary to the rules, but he never follows them.

Senator Perrault: Having due regard for the Leader of the Opposition's passionate dedication to the rules, may I say that I am not about to inflict a half-hour dissertation on the subject of any question raised by him yesterday, but I hope a reply will be available at 4 o'clock this afternoon. As well, a reply to yesterday's question relating to the Post Office should be here in approximately 25 minutes.

Senator Flynn: How long?

Senator Perrault: I seek at every opportunity to convey only accurate information.

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the First Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak on this topic before I have an answer to my question of yesterday, but if anyone else wishes to speak, he or she is welcome to do so. I am willing to yield.

Order stands.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SIXTY-FIFTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, BONN, WEST GERMANY— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, October 19, 1978:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Sixty-fifth Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Bonn, West Germany, 5th to 13th September, 1978, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I had the privilege of representing the Senate of Canada at the Sixty-fifth Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference which was held in Bonn, in the Federal Republic of Germany, September 3 to 14, 1978, inclusive. During the conference the Canadian delegation, led by Lloyd Francis, Ph.D., M.P., participated in all the items on the agenda.

The members of the Canadian delegation were Lloyd Francis, Ph.D., M.P., Chairman, the Honourable Gildas Molgat and myself, representing the Senate of Canada, and Ursula Appoloni, M.P., Thomas C. Douglas, M.P., Ramon J. Hnatyshyn, M.P., David MacDonald, M.P., Gus MacFarlane, M.P., Mark MacGuigan, Ph.D., M.P., Robert Muir, M.P. and Craig Stewart, M.P.

The Canadian delegation was assisted greatly by the Executive Secretary-Treasurer, Miss Jean Macpherson, who was assisted by Miss Maija Adamson, Deputy Secretary to the delegation, and by Mr. Roger Hill, Adviser to the delegation.

Mr. Beverley Koester, Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons, and Mr. Joseph Maingot, Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel, House of Commons, attended meetings of the Association of Secretaries General of Parliament, which took place at the same time as the conference.

During our stay in Bonn, the Canadian ambassador to the Federal Republic of Germany, Mr. John G. H. Halstead, and his wife, provided excellent support to our delegation. The ambassador and embassy officials gave our delegation a useful briefing on bilateral relations between the two countries.

The opening ceremony took place on Tuesday, September 5, 1978, at 11 a.m. in the Beethovenhalle, Bonn, in the presence of the President of the Federal Republic of Germany, Mr. Walter Scheel.

Mr. Karl Carstens, President of the Bundestag and the Inter-Parliamentary Group of the Federal Republic of Germany, welcomed the delegates and reminded us that this was the third Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference to be held on German soil. The fifteenth conference was held in Berlin in 1908, and the twenty-fifth Conference was held there in 1928. Now, 50 years later, in 1978, the sixty-fifth Conference was being held in Bonn.

Mr. Helmut Schmidt, Federal Chancellor, spoke and expressed the wish that the nations of the world would find the way to a lasting peace. He pointed out that parliament was a place of peaceful balance, and if those attending the conference remained true to that idea during their handling of the controversial topics, they would have discharged part of their assignment, namely, to serve the people who gave them a mandate.

Eighteen nations were represented at the first conference in Berlin, and 38 at the second conference. Representatives of seventy-two nations attended the sixty-fifth conference, which testified to the lasting validity of the whole concept of the Inter-Parliamentary Union.

The President of the Federal Republic of Germany, Mr. Walter Scheel, welcomed the delegates on behalf of the republic. He said that just as representatives of national governments worked in the United Nations toward the solution of international problems, generations of parliamentarians had found in the Inter-Parliamentary Union a worldwide forum in which they pursued the same aims, and the work done there was instrumental in preserving peace. Their work also expressed the conviction that democratic parliamentarianism was the political system in which necessary change had the greatest chance of being accomplished without the use of force and with respect for the inviolable dignity of man. He expressed the hope that the conference, aided by personal contacts and mutual understanding, might contribute to the strengthening of parliamentary principles in the world.

The first major item for discussion on the agenda was the report of the Committee on Political Questions, International Security and Disarmament, followed by the report of the Committee on Parliamentary, Juridical and Human Rights Questions, and the report of the Economic and Social Committee which discussed the role of parliaments in the protection of the family and the general care of children and youth.

During the plenary session on these topics, our leader, Mr. Lloyd Francis, took a very active role. Mr. Francis pointed out the steps taken in recent years toward détente in Europe, including the Final Act of the Helsinki Conference, the Belgrade Review Conference, and the Inter-Parliamentary Conference on European Co-operation and Security held in Vienna earlier in the year. He noted the continuing concern and disappointment in Canada about the issue of family reunification.

He further welcomed the initiatives taken by the special Committee of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, and praised its work and its concentration on specific cases, which had led, in some instances, to the release of men and women who had been imprisoned or even tortured. In this connection, he also congratulated certain delegates because they had been willing to listen to criticism of their countries and had promised to look into charges of human rights violations rather than withdrawing from the meeting.

Senator Gildas Molgat also took part in the debate. He stated that when Canada speaks about disarmament, not only nuclear weapons are implied but the reference is to general and total disarmament as the final objective. He recommended, among other things, a total ban on nuclear tests, an agreement to put an end to test flights over all new strategic areas, an agreement forbidding research in new fissile materials for use in armaments, and a gradual reduction in the military budgets or funds for new strategic arms. The objective of his proposals was to proceed by degrees toward reaching a point where it would become possible to put a complete stop to the production of new strategic arms.

Following the plenary debate, the next item on the agenda was the fixing of fair prices for primary commodities supplied mainly by the developing nations, the maintenance of the purchasing power provided by their exports, and the alleviation of their external debts.

Mr. T. C. Douglas spoke on behalf of the Canadian delegation, and suggested that steps should be taken to alleviate the poverty which blights the lives of more than half the world's population. He suggested that our world, with half its population hungry, will not long survive and that something must be done to deal with the income gap between developed and developing countries, which had widened steadily in the past 30 years rather than narrowed. He suggested that this is largely due to the fact that the prices received for primary products have not kept pace with what primary producing nations must pay for manufactured goods, with the consequence that producers of primary commodities face growing trade deficits, which require further borrowing, and a resulting decline in the values of their currencies.

The next major topic for discussion was the role of parliamentarians in the study and elaboration of means to combat international terrorism. Speaking for the Canadian delegation, Mr. Mark MacGuigan remarked that terrorism is violence of a peculiarly heinous kind, differing from other uses of force in that it injures one person with the intention of affecting others, rather than effecting some purpose with respect to the person or persons against whom it is applied. After genocide, he claimed, terrorism was the most inhumane act, since it treats individual persons solely as symbols, not as themselves, and as a consequence people become mere means to the attainment of ends to which they have no relationship. Terrorism achieves its effect by indiscriminate hurt and slaughter, and is therefore entirely unlike resistance or guerilla warfare.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane also spoke concerning terrorism. He drew particular attention to the joint communiqué on terrorism issued after the Bonn summit meeting, and especially to the section on exclusion from civil aviation of any state which does not punish the perpetrator of an act of hijacking, extradite him, or return the hijacked aircraft. He said that Canadians would prefer an even stronger stand against terrorism, but we would at this time concentrate on the particular question of aircraft hijacking, in support of a proposal on this matter originally put forward by the Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, and then adopted by the Bonn summit meeting. In this way it might be possible to take one small step forward.

Mr. MacFarlane concluded his remarks by drawing attention to the need for friendly relations among nations, and for the achievement of international co-operation in solving world problems of an economic, social or humanistic kind.

The next item discussed at the conference was the continuation of most strenuous efforts towards the complete elimination of colonialism in the world. During this debate, Mr. David MacDonald said that recent Canadian initiatives in business and in commerce indicated that Canada had increasingly adopted a position in favour of independence for the black people of southern Africa and for their full liberation. In 1977 Canada had become a member of a group at the United Nations working on the problem of trans-national corporations, and had played an active role in the group of five nations dealing with the hoped-for independence of Namibia. Canada had also adopted a new policy in commercial and governmental relations with southern Africa.

During the meetings of the drafting committee, which followed the plenary session, the Canadian delegates played an active role and were able to make substantial amendments to most of the resolutions which were adopted concerning the several topics that were discussed at the meeting, especially those pertaining to disarmament, terrorism and the elimination of colonialism in the world.

Honourable senators, after attending my first Inter-Parliamentary Union conference, I was quite impressed with the calibre of parliamentarians from the many countries of the world who were speaking for the millions who could not speak for themselves, and who look to us to voice their longing for a world in which they and their children might hope to live in peace and dignity. As we met in Bonn to discuss these world problems, each country's delegates spoke with wisdom and humility, and not with arrogance or self-righteousness. I left the conference with the knowledge that there are many problems still facing the people of the world today—problems such as those of poverty, hunger, illiteracy, the denial of the right of self-determination, and armed confrontation—all of which are roadblocks on the road to peace. I left the conference knowing that if we fail in solving these problems, we can never hope for a continued world peace.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

SPANISH PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

The Hon. the Speaker: On behalf of all honourable members of the Senate I should like to extend to the Spanish Parliamentary Delegation visiting us today, and especially to its leader, His Excellency Antonio Hernandez Gil, President of the Cortes and of the Council of the Realm, our most sincere and cordial welcome, and our best wishes for a pleasant stay in Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Senor Presidente, buenos dias from all of us. May I say on behalf of the government members who serve in this place how pleased, delighted and honoured we are to have such a distinguished delegation visit our nation at this time—a time when both Spain and Canada are deeply involved in constitutional evolution and change, which hopefully will provide both peoples with even more united nations.

Senator Grosart: On behalf of honourable senators on this side, I join, of course, with the Leader of the Government in welcoming to our chamber this very distinguished delegation from the Parliament of the Cortes of Spain.

We are delighted that these distinguished parliamentarians have been explaining to Canadian parliamentarians how they were able to get a new constitution passed by both their houses in such short order. I understand that has been finally achieved since their arrival in Canada, and that all it requires now is public acceptance in a referendum.

We envy our friends from Spain this achievement, and wish them luck in the referendum.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might add to the remarks of the Leader of the Government and the Acting Leader of the Opposition. I have had the honour of chairing the briefing sessions with the Spanish delegation during the last two days, and it has been indeed a great honour for me and a great pleasure to have had that opportunity.

My experience in following the progress of democratization in Spain over the last two years has been one of the most constructive and productive experiences of my life. I was in Spain some two years ago at the beginning of the process, and I was there about a year ago and saw it progressing rapidly toward the stage that the Spanish Parliament has now achieved. After only some 15 months in the process, the Cortes, the Congress and the Senate, the bicameral parliamentary system of Spain, have come to agreement on a draft of the Constitution and are now prepared to put it quickly before the people of Spain—I believe December 5, or early in December, is the expected time for the referendum—after which they will proceed with municipal, regional and national elections. It is therefore likely that within a period of three years the people of Spain will have moved to a complete democracy, a constitutional monarchy, a democratic Parliament. That, in my opinion, is one of the greatest examples the world has seen of what can be accomplished by people who have not had the opportunities of democracy before.

I congratulate the delegation from Spain. His Excellency has been most generous to his Canadian colleagues, as have all members of the delegation. It has been a great pleasure to be with them during these days.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we will be commemorating Remembrance Day in two days' time. Once again we will have the opportunity to pay honour and tribute to the thousands of Canadian men and women who suffered and died in the cause of freedom, those who sacrificed so much in order that the rest of us can live and flourish, and so that our descendants can live and flourish, in a united Canada with all of the freedoms we enjoy.

Remembrance Day will be a reminder to all Canadians, wherever we live, to see to it that we do not squander the legacy that was left behind by those who suffered and died.

The visit of Prime Minister Begin to Canada this week brought home the fact that individuals can mean all the difference between war and peace in this world. It is to be hoped that all Canadians will observe Remembrance Day, and it is to be hoped that those who will be laying wreaths on cenotaphs on Saturday will include the peacemakers of the world in their prayers.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have the honour to reply to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am sure I speak for all my colleagues in this chamber in paying tribute to our fallen countrymen today, prior to a remembrance ceremony that will take place on Saturday at the National War Memorial in our proud capital city. In so doing, perhaps I can use the same words I used last year in the other place. They are appropriate today, and will be appropriate for some time to come.

In this time of uncertainty, it should be remembered that some 64 years ago thousands of young Canadian citizens answered the call of the then government of the day to volunteer to go to far off lands, to offer their lives, and in too many cases to give those lives, to preserve peace and freedom, not for Canada alone but to help protect our allies, whose problems must have been difficult to comprehend.

But it is obvious that their efforts were in vain, for on two future occasions, during the Second World War and the Korean War, more of our young men and women answered the call because our world leaders could not preserve that peace and freedom which we as Canadians treasure so dearly.

However, the passage of time has now brought about a generation for whom World War I has become very remote, and for whom even the other conflicts have no meaningful place in their experience. It is incumbent upon us, we who sit in this hallowed chamber, many of us veterans ourselves who experienced the bitter taste of war, to remind ourselves that we are charged with the responsibility of ensuring that some 100,000 Canadians who died did not die in vain. And we must continue in our efforts to preserve peace, a measure of prosperity and, above all, national unity, because of our commitment to the veterans of Canada.

It is tragic, however, that in this year 1978, while hundreds of thousands of our fellow citizens attend ceremonies across this land to honour and to pay homage to those who made the supreme sacrifice to preserve Canadian unity, we are threatened with national disunity from within our great country, a threat to our freedom that breaks faith not only with those who fell but with those who remain—the maimed and the disabled—and whose dependants must wonder if their sacrifice was in vain.

We can only hope that Remembrance Day 1978 will instill in the hearts of those minorities, those who are taking this country for granted, those who attempt to fracture a way of opportunity and a quality of life brought about by the suffering and sacrifice of Canadians regardless of race, creed or colour, a reminder of the fact that these men fought together for unity in our nation, not as English or French or any other race but as proud Canadians.

To this end we must dedicate ourselves today because we must continue to believe in peace and freedom, and because we will continue to remember those who fell.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Senator Langlois moved, seconded by Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e):

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 14, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to deal briefly with what we can expect to have before us when we resume next week both in the chamber and in the committees of the Senate. I might say that our workload looks to be very substantial for the next few weeks.

In addition to the two Senate bills already on the order paper for Tuesday, it is likely that there will be one and perhaps two bills introduced in the Senate next week. I have been informed that Bill C-5, to amend the Old Age Security Act, and Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, are expected to pass in the Commons this week and come to the Senate. We should also have Bill C-7, the Borrowing Authority Act, 1978-79-80, early next week.

The committee schedule for the coming week is already heavy. On Tuesday the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution will hold an in camera meeting at 10.30 a.m. and 2.30 p.m.; the Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies will meet at 2 p.m.; and the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will meet at 2.30 p.m. to consider supplementary estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979, which were referred to that committee a few moments ago.

On Wednesday at 9.30 a.m. there will be a meeting of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee to examine the subject matter of Bill C-15, Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1978; the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline will meet in camera when the Senate rises; and also when the Senate rises the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will meet to consider its agenda for the present session.

On Thursday the Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies will meet at 9 a.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 9.30 a.m. to consider further the subject matter of Bill C-15, or any legislation that may have been referred to it in the meantime. The National Finance Committee will hold a meeting at 9.30 for further consideration of supplementary estimates (A), if the committee does not finish with these estimates on Tuesday. After completion of its examination of the supplementary estimates (A), the National Finance Committee will continue with its study of the DREE estimates.

In view of the foregoing, it may be necessary for the Senate to sit on Friday next week.

Senator Grosart: Did I understand the Deputy Leader of the Government to say that in addition to Bill S-6 and Bill S-7, which are now on the order paper, there will be additional bills introduced for the first time in the Senate?

Senator Langlois: Yes. I believe there are two bills to be introduced in this place.

Senator Grosart: Is it premature to ask that they be identified or that their subject matter be identified at this time?

Senator Langlois: I am afraid I cannot at this time identify those two bills.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in addition to the information that has been given to us by the deputy leader, I can inform you that Mr. Sharp, the Commissioner of the Northern Pipeline Agency, has agreed to come to the Northern Pipeline Committee next Wednesday. It will therefore be an open rather than an in camera meeting.

Motion agreed to.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

OBSERVANCE BY POST OFFICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I made a commitment two days ago to attempt to provide further information with respect to Remembrance Day as it affects the Post Office. The question was asked on November 7 by the Honourable Senator Marshall.

I can now report that the Post Office has made arrangements to accommodate those of its work force who wish specifically to honour Canada's war dead on Remembrance Day, November 11.

Certain employees are involved in the limited service normally provided on Saturdays. In order to ensure that these employees have the time to participate in local remembrance services or activities, service levels to the public will be adjusted as required at the discretion of district directors in consultation with postal unions.

The minister responsible for the Post Office, Postmaster General Lamontagne, has stated, and I quote:

Remembrance Day is particularly significant to the Post Office since so many of our employees came from amongst the ranks of veterans returning from overseas. It gives management a great deal of pride to assist in marking this day with all the respect it deserves.

[Senator Langlois.]

THE CONSTITUTION

THE GOVERNMENT'S INTENTION RESPECTING THE SENATE—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on November 7 the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate asked whether the Leader of the Government here would confirm that it is the government's position not to proceed with the proposition in Bill C-60 respecting the abolition of the Senate and its replacement by a House of the Federation, or any similar provision, without the unanimous consent of the provinces, as mentioned in the Hansard account of the reply by the Prime Minister.

The government intends to proceed with a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada requesting the court's opinion regarding Parliament's authority to legislate with respect to the Senate of Canada. The government will not, before the court gives its opinion, proceed without the unanimous consent of the provinces with any legislation to change the Senate in the context of its constitutional reform initiatives.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government if the phrase "before the court has given its decision" is something that has been added since the Prime Minister made his statement.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only report that this is an official reply prepared by the office of the Prime Minister for the information of this house, and I have presented it in the form in which it has come to me. Obviously the government does not intend to proceed unilaterally before that Supreme Court decision is made known, and the only possible way in which action could be taken before the Supreme Court referral and decision is the unlikely possibility of unanimous consent for any change.

Senator Grosart: Would the leader undertake to answer a further supplementary question arising out of the answer given to Senator Flynn? Would he inform the Senate as to what kind of consent of the provinces would be required after the Supreme Court decision before the government would proceed unilaterally with this particular aspect of what was Bill C-60?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice. It has been the view of the government that no enduring constitutional change could be brought forward in Canada without the substantial support of the Canadian people, and the designation "Canadian people" would certainly involve the provincial governments. However, a further inquiry will go forward.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I think that the answer just given by the government leader is ambiguous on two counts. First, he did not confirm that the Prime Minister stated in the other place that the government was suspending the study of Bill C-60 as concerns the Senate.

Second, the government leader did not say either—in the event of a Supreme Court decision saying that the federal government may unilaterally change federal institutions without consulting the provinces—he did not say what would be the position of the federal government before such a decision and if it would consider consulting the provinces before bringing any changes in federal institutions.

Given this confusion and the fact that some explanations would be important for the members of this house, would the government leader invite the Prime Minister of our country to meet the members of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution, which will be sitting next week? He might then clearly define his position whether to proceed or not proceed with constitutional changes affecting the Senate.

I think that the answer given today by the government leader is ambiguous and equivocal and that the members of this house should know where they are going and what should be their position as regards this statement and the lack of clarification by the government leader.

As I said, I suggest that, in such circumstances, the Prime Minister be invited and that the government leader invite him to appear before the Special Committee on the Constitution to state the government position as concerns changes in the Senate.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Careful consideration will be given to the ideas advanced by the Honourable Senator Asselin.

Perhaps I can add further clarification by saying that if the Supreme Court confirms the right of Parliament to legislate with respect to the Senate under section 91.1 of the British North America Act, the government would want to keep the option of proceeding unilaterally. That does not mean to say that the government would proceed unilaterally without consultation. If I may advance a personal view, it would be unthinkable that they would advance unilaterally without discussion with the provincial premiers.

At the recent constitutional talks in Ottawa it was clear that the federal government had an open mind on the subject of constitutional change and reform. The government was very forthcoming and a number of constructive initiatives were advanced.

In addition, very careful study is being given to the excellent report prepared by the committee chaired by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, in which so many senators participated, as well as the report of the joint committee. The government is taking both reports very seriously.

Senator Forsey: Would it be fair, honourable senators, to say that the reply of the Leader of the Government is, "Not necessarily unilaterally but unilaterally if necessary"?

REMEMBRANCE DAY

OBSERVANCE BY POST OFFICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I want to refer to the reply given to my question concerning Remembrance Day and those employees of crown corporations who will be working on November 11. With the greatest respect, I do not think the answer is satisfactory.

The government leader and I have just indicated that Remembrance Day is a day when all Canadians pay homage to those who fell. The fact that those veterans who are working in the Post Office and other crown corporations will be allowed a holiday is not good enough. They know why Remembrance Day is being observed.

I think it is time, after sixty-four years, to uphold the Canada Holidays Act and the provincial acts that concern Remembrance Day.

The Leader of the Government did not give me a reply from the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I would appreciate it if he would follow up the matter, even though the day may be late. If the Canada Holidays Act is meaningless, why do we continue to observe Remembrance Day?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, when a number of questions were posed in the chamber on this important subject, I sought the earliest opportunity to have a personal meeting with the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I mentioned the Post Office situation to him specifically, and we discussed the question generally.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs indicated his satisfaction with the action taken by the Postmaster General with respect to the Post Office. The fact is that there are certain activities in this country which must proceed whether the day be Remembrance Day or not. There are certain services which must continue, and Air Canada is an example.

The government can only endeavour to ensure that people wishing to observe Remembrance Day may do so. I trust that those who, because of the nature of their occupations and responsibilities, find themselves at their places of work, will take time out at 11 a.m. on November 11 to remember those who died. No doubt this will take place in many places around the country. I am sure the honourable senator shares my views on this.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ERROR IN TRANSLATION

Senator Langlois: I should like to bring to the attention of the Senate an error in the translation of the Speech from the Throne as reported in both the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate of Wednesday, October 11, 1978. The following paragraph reads in English as follows:

Another is the legitimate expectation of the people of Canada in these difficult times. They expect their Parliament to respond to their most urgent needs with insight, with action, and with a minimum of delay.

That paragraph was translated as follows:

A cette raison s'ajoutent les attentes légitimes de tous les Canadiens en ces temps difficiles. Ils comptent sur leurs représentants élus pour répondre avec sagesse, détermination et diligence à leurs besoins les plus pressants.

In this instance, "Parliament" is translated as "elected representatives". This is untrue and not realistic. I hope the translators will remember, once and for all, that Parliament is composed of two houses, an elected house and an appointed house, which is the Senate.

UNITED NATIONS

THIRTY-THIRD MEETING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, November 7, 1978:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Thirty-third Meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations (1978), and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Assembly and the participation therein of the observers from the Parliament of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, having had the opportunity to attend the Thirty-third Meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations, I wish to make a few comments regarding this unique organization. However, before doing so, I should like to express to all those who suggested my name to the Minister of External Affairs and, more precisely, my leader, the Honourable Jacques Flynn, Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, my sincere appreciation for their consideration.

In passing, may I say that Senator Flynn is doing an outstanding job. I am sure that when he is called upon to be the Leader of the Government in the Senate he will carry out his duties with experience, dignity and competence. Given the quality of his service to this house, he will, I am sure, be recognized as the opposition leader who had the greatest impact in terms of improving legislation that went through this house during his years in that office. Of course, he came to us well qualified from the other place.

[Translation]

I would also like to tell briefly Madam Speaker, the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, how much I appreciate sitting in this august assembly with her in the Chair. She has been carrying out her duties with dignity, competence, and particularly with a charming grace all her own.

Honourable senators, allow me to tell the Leader of the Government, the Honourable Ray Perrault, how much I appreciated the speech he made during the luncheon given for the Spanish delegation. By speaking to our guests in three languages, Spanish, English and French, he not only pleased them but gave reality and hope to bilingualism and to multiculturalism. I congratulate him, aware that his distinguished grandmother, Mrs. Perrault, was a Bélisle.

[English]

May I also express my gratitude to our Ambassador and Permanent Representative to the United Nations, Mr. William Barton, for his courtesy and for the assistance given me during my stay in New York. I am of the opinion that Canadian observers are accepted more freely and that their role is better understood. To him and to his staff, my sincere thanks.

[Senator Langlois.]

Having had the privilege of being sent to the United Nations in 1963, 1964, 1965 and on other occasions, I took the liberty, in 1964, of assessing the role of the U.N. and of reporting to you that it was the tower of Babel of the twentieth century.

The theme of the United Nations in this its thirty-third year is Onward, and if the United Nations did not exist it, or something very like it, would have to be invented in an effort to keep the world from being blown apart by war. That was worth pondering during United Nations Week marking the thirty-third anniversary of the world organization's founding.

It is my opinion that the United Nations General Assembly spends too much time listening to long-winded speeches. It is over-weighted by delegates from third world countries who take up altogether too much time droning on about South Africa and Rhodesia, and concocting mischievous resolutions about their obsessions, especially the so-called "national liberation movement".

The U.N. is buffeted by polemics from all sides, on all manner of issues and, no doubt, at times it is also in danger of drowning under an ocean of paper generated by a swollen bureaucracy. But when a crisis occurs, capable of shaking the foundations of world peace, it is to the U.N. that the world invariably turns. Consider the 1956 Suez crisis and the various Arab-Israeli wars. In each case, the U.N. was able to come up with some sort of interim solution, sufficient to stop the fighting and provide an opportunity for further negotiations.

Other crisis situations, of course, have come and gone without the United Nations doing anything of note because, essentially, it was powerless to do anything. Examples are the Soviet invasions of Hungary and Czechoslovakia.

Not to be forgotten is the immensely valuable social welfare and educational work the U.N. does through specialized agencies such as the World Health Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization, and the Children's Fund. The world would be a lesser place without the U.N. to kick around.

The United Nations has lasted 33½ years since the Charter was signed in San Francisco. However, it is a much different institution now than then. There are 150 nations now, with this year's admission of Solomon Islands, as compared with 51 in 1945 when the member nations were all allies in an anti-fascist war. The Charter still contains enemy clauses, partly because of its possible effect on the status of West Berlin, but membership is now vastly different and includes former enemies. Two-thirds of those countries did not exist in 1945. A group of 77, now 110, the United Nations was established to guarantee peace and security. Now it is more concerned with the New International Economic Order, the corollary in economic terms of political decolonization, and various mechanisms to bring it about, such as the Committee of the Whole, the Common Fund, et cetera. This is probably the most basic fact of the U.N. today.

Canadians were active participants in the drafting of the Charter in 1945, a position we earned on the battlefield, as we had in World War I. The Right Honourable Laird Borden signed the Peace Treaty for Canada, but under the grouping of "British Empire." Colonel Moore Cosgrave signed Japan's surrender instrument in Tokyo Bay, admittedly on the wrong line, but for "Canada."

Even before the 1931 Statute of Westminster, Canada was a full-fledged member of the League of Nations, but it was a case of gaining status rather than accepting responsibilities. Ambassador Walter Riddell was repudiated by the Right Honourable W. L. MacKenzie King when he supported oil sanctions against Italy. Today the Security Council has a sanctions program against Rhodesia, even if its effectiveness has been questioned by the recent Bingham Report on massive British evasions of oil sanctions. Also, there are contingency plans regarding sanctions against South Africa in respect of Namibia, and in other contexts.

In 1945 Canada had hopes of gaining status as a middle power—participation in the Manhattan Project, the fourth largest allied navy, and so on—and our most important effort in San Francisco was the so-called "battle of the comma" to gain recognition of that status.

Today there are just two kinds of powers, nuclear and non-nuclear. But superpowers have not had their way entirely. The Bahamas, with 250,000 people, and our neighbour, the United States, with 225 million, each have one vote. That is ridiculous in some ways. But superpowers have had to play a propaganda game. Each General Assembly has seen new Soviet initiatives in the disarmament field. For example, there is this year's proposal on security guarantees for non-nuclear states. In a sense, the U.N. has worked. There has been no major world war in 33 years, even though there have been some 130 minor conflicts.

Despite the high hopes of 1945, disillusion has fast set in. The wartime alliance quickly disintegrated. We have had Yalta, the Red Army occupation of Eastern Europe, Czechoslovakia in 1948 and the Berlin airlift in 1949, which were presaged in Canada by the Gouzenko affair. There was a feeling that the United Nations would have a shorter and less glorious history than the League of Nations. The "cold war," the great power veto and the frustrated hopes of peace and security became the burden of the U.N. To date, the great issues in east-west confrontation—Berlin and Vietnam—have never been taken up in the U.N.

However, the United Nations and the Charter have survived. The Charter has been used in ingenious ways. Article 51, "Regional Security," is justification for NATO. In 1950, the U.N. went to war in Korea. The U.S.S.R. was absent from the Security Council at the time; when it returned, the formula of "uniting for peace" evolved in 1951, which allowed the General Assembly to act when the Security Council blocked.

The centrality of the U.N. to world affairs is still evident. Whether or not major issues were actually brought to the U.N., it still remains the important theatre for diplomatic action. Over 200 foreign and other ministers come each year to the United Nations General Assembly for general debate; not so much to debate but to speak to counterparts. Additionally, of the 150 member states, some are very small indeed. Bhutan has two missions; Maldives but one. So much bilateral as well as multilateral activity is centred on the U.N.

Before continuing my assessment, I should like to make a few comments on China, which I visited on my own this last summer. Chairman Mao Tse-tung's embalmed body lies on display in a stately tomb in Peking, but his ideas about governing China don't go marching on. Other people are in charge now—a coterie of hard-headed, achievement-oriented politicians. Publicly they still pay lip-service to the teachings of the "great helmsman" of the 1949 communist revolution. But to their dismay, they find China still economically backward and militarily weak compared to its worst enemy, the Soviet Union. They are out to correct this. In the two years since Mao's death they have scrapped wholesale his policies on economics, diplomacy, foreign trade and education. They also plunged China into international politics and business in a way undreamed of a few years ago.

Mao dominated China for 27 years, until his death in 1976. To this end he had a master politician's ability to hang on to power and to bushwhack anybody who tried to bypass him. He had little interest in science, engineering or business, but his dictates on those subjects were law. Under them China tried to develop its economy in isolation and kept its contacts with foreign countries at a minimum. The pressure of world events forced Mao to make grudging retreats in his later years. When he died, the dam broke and a torrent of changes was let loose.

Mao's successor as Chairman of the Chinese Communist Party is Hua Kuo-feng, a 58-year old party administrator, unknown outside China before Mao made him Premier in 1976. A month after Mao's death, Hua and his allies won a fierce power struggle by arresting Mao's widow and his other top advisers, a faction known in China as the "Gang of Four". Teng Hsiao-ping, 74, a pragmatic efficiency expert, twice disgraced in Mao's lifetime, was made Vice-Premier and given the green light to put China on the road to economic progress.

Mao frowned on importing foreign technology, borrowing money and selling China's natural resources to raise cash. All these strictures have been cast to the winds. China and Japan are negotiating a mammoth deal, by which Japan will swap $40 billion worth of industrial machinery for $40 billion worth of Chinese coal and oil over the next 13 years. Japan's Minister of International Trade and Industry, Toshio Komoto, announced on October 16 that Japan expected to lend China $11.1 billion for the development of China's offshore oil resources. Even the Americans may get a piece of that action—something unthinkable in Mao's time.

[Translation]

What is the situation in the world in this fall of 1978? Everyone is talking about the Camp David talks, and it is capital. But that it is only one aspect of the overall problem that is often unknown and, worse, misunderstood.

To put this in the best perspective, I would like to try to answer the four following questions:

What is the political conquest strategy that proved the most efficient in the past forty years?

What ends and what means are used by those who implement that strategy?

How do threatened countries envision their protection?

What is basically missing in the defensive system of these countries?

I have no other qualification to answer those questions than that of a man from Sudbury who has been following the news for over a third of a century, a Canadian who, having visited all of western Europe, half of eastern Europe, Asia, Africa, the Americas, and recently, Japan, China and Hong Kong, knows what he is talking about, and also a Christian who knows that God can do the impossible and thinks that the time is near when it will be indispensable to remember that.

What is the political conquest strategy that proved the most efficient in the past forty years?

The question seems less odd than it would appear to be. It is little known that from 1945 to 1974 there were 74 major armed conflicts. Among those, eleven changed frontiers following wars of colonial independence and as the result of wars between states. So it would be somewhat superficial to think that our world has been living in peace since 1945.

But, more particularly, no one believes any more in the radical and simplistic distinction between war and peace. Before 1939, there was nothing else. That is how Hitler was allowed to increase his aggressions without practically anything being done about it. After showing so much "patience", a world conflict whose consequences no one anticipated was brought about and ruined Europe and left millions of dead. Those who set it in motion did not imagine that there would have been other ways of overcoming national socialism.

Well, what is the situation today? As far as imperialism is concerned, European countries have withdrawn from Asia and Africa. The United States of America, like Japan—and western Europe, for that matter—have been trying to conquer markets, not colonies. On the other hand, there was a country which used the victory of 1945 to turn all eastern European countries into satellites. This same country, by fostering from afar a revolutionary civil war, extended its empire over China in 1948. Then, military support interventions enabled it to conquer northern Korea and northern Indochina between 1950 and 1954. It was a coup which reduced Cuba between North and South America to the position of satellite.

However, without recalling world history in the last few years, it is sufficient to evoke the role of Soviet or Cuban interventions in Angola, Mozambique, Ethiopia, Madagascar, and, these last few weeks, in Afghanistan, North Yemen and Iran, where revolution is impending, to understand that half of Europe, half of Asia and half of Africa have been conquered by the U.S.S.R. in the last 40 years. This is the most effective political conquest strategy of this century. Basically, the break with China in 1960 does not make much difference.

Moreover, my observations during my trip to China changed nothing with respect to my opinion on Marxism. China is still strongly Marxist and atheist and Russia is still losing its influence and its authority in that country. The name of Russia is very rarely mentioned by the Chinese, and when it is it is often with malice and discontent.

What ends and what means are used by those who implement that strategy?

Before attempting to answer this question, I would like to say that those who implement this long term strategy are mortal human beings. Lenin died in 1924; Stalin, in 1953; Khrushchev was removed from power in 1964 before dying in 1971, and Brezhnev, who succeeded him, has supposedly been ill for many years! However, Lenin brought about the Russian revolution. Stalin conquered Eastern Europe and China. Khrushchev prepared the pressures exerted on the Middle East and Africa and achieved the satellization of Cuba. Brezhnev caused the fall of the Indochinese peninsula and began the conquest of Africa on a very large scale. In other words, the men may change, but the strategy progresses.

Its final end is very obvious. It aims at extending the Soviet empire and its ideology, dialectic materialism, to all countries and all continents of the world. Nearly one half of the inhabited territories are already subjugated in law or in fact to this empire. However, beyond its sphere of influence, two realities constitute a significant power that still escapes it—a spiritual reality that includes all those who believe in one God, the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. In their heart the Church of Jesus Christ is spread and communicated the world over—a political, economic and military reality; the individualistic West is willy-nilly federated from a defence point of view around the United States armed forces, the most powerful army vis-à-vis the Soviet army.

However materialistic they may be, Soviet strategists do not underestimate the spiritual powers still left in the world. They have indeed worked hard to bring about within the Catholic Church the emergence of an integrative right wing and a progressive left. They have not stopped fostering tensions between the Islamic world and Israel. Today at a time when Begin and Sadat are trying to achieve peace, because they both believe in God, Moscow's action aims at politicizing Islam and opposing the front of refusal to the front of peace, namely, the progressist Arab states to the others.

Yet the essential aspect of the Leninist strategy these days and since 1973 is not to be found there. It aims—and this is becoming more and more evident—at controlling in a radical and irreversible manner all the oil sources without which Europe can no longer survive. If ever the Soviets gain control over these sources and are in a position to dry them out, it will be without having recourse to war that Europe, brought to its knees, will in turn become a satellite. Economic paralysis will suffice. The Americas will then be isolated and encircled.

It was in 1973 in the aftermath of the Kippur war that Soviet agents hinted to the oil-producing Arab leaders that the West could afford to pay. Knowing little in economics, the producers did not understand that raising the price of the oil sold to the western countries would entail a similar rise in western prices of commodities sold to oil-producing countries. They therefore got involved blindly in an operation whose true purpose, unknown then to most of those who had recourse to it, was to unleash a galloping inflation in the western countries. It took five years for the oil-producing countries to realize that they had been tricked. Meanwhile the Soviet strategy had made the threat loom even bigger.

There are only three routes along which the oil the West needs can be shipped to the West from the Middle East where 57 per cent of the world reserves are located:

The oldest one is through the Suez Canal. Cut in 1967, reopened in 1975, only ships whose tonnage is less than 60,000 tons can presently use it. However, works carried out over a period of several years will make it navigable by oil tankers of a superior tonnage.

Yet at the very moment when France was leaving Djibouti, the Soviets were solidly setting foot in Ethiopia while spreading their influence to North Yemen, thereby preparing for total control over the canal outlet on the Indian Ocean.

The second oil route goes through the desert of Syria, a country armed by the U.S.S.R. This explains in part what is happening in Lebanon. The Russians have now set foot in Iraq and Afghanistan and they are now striving to take over Iran. With such conquests they would have direct access not only to the Indian Ocean but also to the Mediterranean, through a willing Syria. The emirates would be directly threatened.

The third and now most important route goes around Africa. In 1974, some 83 per cent of the west bound tonnage sailed down the coast of Africa to the Cape then up through the Atlantic. In order to totally control that route, the U.S.S.R. has but to lay hands on the southern parts of Africa, and the West is now helping it achieve this with drunken stubbornness.

Such is now the U.S.S.R.'s basic strategy. Russia is an oil producing country. So is the United States, but not Europe. We can therefore understand the powerful and perseverant idea of Leonid Brezhnev, who has now been controlling global events for nearly 15 years and planning well ahead all the deadlines that have been reached since 1973 in South-East Asia, the Middle East, and Africa, and he is now organizing a warless capitulation of all Europe.

The discussions at Camp David must be understood in that light. What was at stake there and remains resolved involves much more than peace between Israel and Egypt. It involves the future of the world itself.

How do threatened countries envision their protection? I hardly dare answer.

I have analyzed here President Carter's policy. The local but real and significant progress at Camp David should not lead us to forget the main weakness of the United States' attitude toward Russia.

The Soviet Union can choose either confrontation or co-operation. The United States are ready to cope with either choice.

So spoke President Carter at Annapolis on June 7.

In other words, the Americans are hesitating between two hopes: either make Soviets "understand" that the American way of freedom and prosperity is respectable and should be let alone to expand, or "confrontation"; in other words, war. It is a terrifying thought that the current U.S. diplomacy has no other overall plan.

President Carter, his trilateralist advisers and a number of other western leaders apparently did not notice the unfolding in the world, month after month, of an indirect strategy that, through hardly noticeable revolutionary means, topples country after country into the Soviet sphere of influence, while preparing Europe's downfall. General Beaufre applied the term "artichoke peeloff" to that process of a step-by-step implementation of an overall effort whose general design escapes the opponent until the last moment.

This is happening now. Saigon's overtaking seemed fair to westerners—that was such a corrupt regime! The communist revolution in Afghanistan seemed acceptable—it was warranted by the backward state of that nomad shepherd nation! We read the other week in a number of our newspapers that wealth was so badly distributed in Iran, the Shah's regime was undefendable! And western countries, for reasons they find compelling, take pleasure in weakening Rhodesia and South Africa, around which 80 per cent of the west's oil supply still travels freely.

Will we finally understand that communist propaganda has been promoting for years two opposite behaviours?

Any violation of human rights in a "capitalist" nation is reason enough for the government's overthrow and the crossing over to the Soviet side. Under that theme, every revolution in Asia and Africa was "gobbled" by the west.

But, on the other hand, any denunciation of human rights violation in a communist country is considered as a lie and leads only to sending signed petitions to the legitimate communist government, which will pretend indeed to be up in arms about it.

I am not exaggerating. While western countries have imposed drastic economic measures on Rhodesia and its Prime Minister Ian Smith, an honest man who, in spite of all opposition, is transferring the political power to non communist blacks, we see that in reaction to Goulag and psychiatric hospitals in the U.S.S.R., the United States decided on July 19 this year to defer selling one computer.

One could make similar comparisons with South Africa. Helping that country turn away from apartheid is quite different from putting Namibia in the hands of guerrillas armed by Moscow. It is in this context that one has to view Mr. Vorster's recent decision to reject the United Nations program for Namibia. By doing that, he attempts to protect the independence of his people—be they black or white—and he also tries to secure oil supplies for the community of nations that condemned him.

One can see how these threatened countries envision their own protection. They prove their goodwill to Moscow by taking a hard line with their allies and a soft one with their opponents. But if naive as they are, they happen unfortunately to be disappointed, hurt or humiliated, they will make war. They did not hesitate with Hitler. They will do it again.

One can understand quite well what Walter Cronkite said about the situation in Iran:

"If you are not worried about the international situation right now, then you will have to have your TV or radio set fixed up".

What is basically missing in the defensive system of western countries? What are they lacking in the face of the greatest danger in history?

The main thing is that democratic countries do not understand that the other side has a "global strategy". The U.S.S.R. does not divide the world according to definite and distinct "problems". It considers all countries as pawns that it has to use to achieve its purpose, which is to have a hold on all oil-producing countries—Middle-Eastern and African countries—in order to be able to have Europe paralyzed and on its knees. Its last move will be to strike America and get it to surrender by wearing it down with a domestic crisis such as Watergate.

On the opposite, the west does not consider problems as a whole and puts up solutions to show their goodwill to the U.S.S.R., never failing thereby to fall into the traps that have been set for them.

Solzenitsyn may have hurt the Americans by saying that what is most striking to the eyes of a stranger is that civic courage has disappeared not only from western society in general but from each of the countries that are part of it, from each party and also, of course, from the United Nations.

Americans do not consider themselves cowardly; indeed they truly believe in fighting another war to achieve world freedom. But Solzenitsyn who, as a lone and courageous fighter, stood up to communist power, does not delude himself by thinking that it is for selfish motives that Americans are letting the strategic powers of the world get stripped to nothing. Why indeed this policy of "all or nothing"?

It is because Americans—and the west in general—naively believe in the virtue of democracy. Where realistic, forceful, commensurate action preventing any further advance would be warranted, the west prefers to look the other way, hoping that communists, seeing the economic results in the west, will abandon their system. The only time Americans acted was in 1962 when they forced Soviet ships carrying missiles to Cuba to turn back. Had they kept the momentum, which would have required strength of character, not later in an apocalyptic war and when everything will be lost but here and now, the USSR would have regressed and not progressed.

[Senator Bélisle.]

To understand that a war is waged against it and that the strength of character cannot be kept in reserve uniquely in the event of a world conflagration, the western world will have to rediscover God. It has to rediscover praying.

What struck me most in the Camp David talks is not the fact that they were lengthy, nor that actual concessions have been made by both parties, but the fact that the result—the first in a very long time—has been achieved by three men who believe in and pray to the same God.

I am more and more convinced that the catastrophies, the ordeals and also the desperation of our society are not the effect of hazard nor even of man's mischievousness. Above anything else, they are due to the fact that our society does not pray anymore. Consequently, it is left with no spiritual strength to fight or resist atheistic militancy. Our society does not of its own accord commit itself to God's protection.

When President Sadat went to Jerusalem on November 19 to pray to the unique God on Jewish soil, many felt a great event was about to occur. When, on December 25, the Israeli Prime Minister set foot on Egyptian soil, that feeling was intensified. In addition, on September 17 last, President Carter reminded us that thirteen days earlier he had asked the whole world to pray for the success of the negotiations, "Those prayers," he added, "were granted beyond our wildest hopes".

In that, I see a sign of renewal. But it is still only a sign. Could it be that a great sense of ecumenism will permeate the world in answer to a prayer for heavenly peace? And why not?

For so many years now the Pope, in Rome, has been asking that we pray for peace, the real one, that which presupposes mutual concessions, reciprocated sacrifices, the respect of agreements. Could it be that the day is drawing near when Catholics, all Christians, the Jews, the Moslems will come to join together, in mutual agreement with believers among the heads of state throughout the world, to obtain from God that the reconciliation between Israel and Ishmael, to which shape was first given on Christmas Day last year, be consecrated by peace, as it is wished, within the next three months?

To have it so, all that need be done is for all believers among the religious and political leaders to make a common statement, in all humility, asking all men and women in the world who share their faith in a God creator and Father, to join in a common entreaty. It could be done between two dates of equal meaning to all sons of Abraham—or which would become so every year from the day of the first "prayer of all believers throughout the world".

We might then have done more to make governing bodies and peoples understand, at long last, what the "indirect strategy" of communism is, by celebrating "human rights" which, in themselves, have not power. It is neither democracy nor human rights that can save humanity by leading it towards wisdom and strength. Only God can do so.

Moreover, it is not enough to avoid war and slavery. It is not enough to avoid giving up naively the extreme strategic positions that guarantee security in Europe, in America and elsewhere. What is needed, in addition, is the occurrence of an unimaginable spiritual event in the world, and that the peoples of Russia and those it dominates find or find anew, through Mary's intercession, the God who leads the history of the nations along different paths, depending on whether they shun or adore him.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

COMMITMENT BY GOVERNMENT LEADER RESPECTING REPRESENTATIONS BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government, but in his absence I think the deputy leader may take it as notice. In any event, the leader would have done so.

On April 13 last, during the discussion on Bill C-8, to amend the Canada Labour Code as reported at page 633 of Hansard for that date—and I am sorry I have to quote but the context of the question requires it—the government leader said:

If we met the requests that have been received from certain groups to be heard now with repeated and new arguments, with variations of the views that they set forth in the other place, if we give those groups the kind of attention Senate committees traditionally give to important representations, the process might take days, perhaps even weeks. Within the timeframe available to Parliament, with the imminence of a national election—

And I remind the house that this was on April 13.

—and there is no mystery about that possibility—the Senate literally could not deal with this measure in committee, hear all these groups and report back to Parliament before prorogation.

He probably meant dissolution.

Senator McIlraith: He did not mention which year.

Senator Flynn: No, he did not mention which year, and he used the wrong word—he said “prorogation” when he meant “dissolution”. But then, his conscience troubling him, he went on to say:

I want to give this commitment to the house. I shall undertake the appropriate initiative in the near future to have the subject of labour relations in the federal sector referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. I certainly hope that all groups not heard on the subject of Bill C-8—

This was a bill sponsored by Senator Marchand, if I remember correctly.

—and indeed many of those who have been heard if the committee should so decide, would appear before that committee to state their views—indeed to state ways in which they think the Labour Code of Canada should be changed at some future date.

Again, “future date” is rather wide.

I have had several inquiries from those who have not been heard and, therefore, I ask the government leader if he is considering undertaking the initiative he promised to undertake on April 13; if he has not done so, when does he anticipate doing so?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, the nature of the question is such that I am not in a position to answer it. The Leader of the Opposition asks when a commitment given by the leader will be fulfilled. I know that the leader has foremost in his mind this undertaking that he gave at that time, but I am in no position to give any information on when that commitment will be met. I shall take the question as notice, and bring it to the attention of the leader when he returns to Ottawa.

Senator Lamontagne: At a future date!

Senator Flynn: I hope he won't give the imminence of a national election as an excuse again.

Senator Langlois: I do not think such rumours are all that strong on your own side.

LABOUR

NUMBER OF STRIKES—QUESTION

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, may I address a question to the Leader of the Government through the kind offices of the able and distinguished acting leader?

Since Canada has the largest number of strikes per capita per year of any industrialized country in the world, would the honourable the Leader of the Government outline what steps, if any, the government proposes to take to reduce the number of strikes?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I am not prepared to accept the premise of the question. However, I shall take it as notice, and I am sure the Leader of the Government will provide an answer at the next opportunity.

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

STUDY OF SOVEREIGNTY-ASSOCIATION BY SENATE COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Since the Economic Council of Canada, through one of its experts, stated last weekend that the sovereignty-association concept supported by the Quebec government would result in the loss of 21,000 and a few hundred jobs in Quebec, and that the Teller group, for which the Honourable Marc Lalonde is the minister responsible, has already stated in a study that there would be a loss of at least of 300,000 jobs, while other experts have quoted other figures and other consequences, that the possible separation of Quebec could have under its concept of sovereignty-association, would it not be in the interest of Quebecers and Canadians in general for the Senate to examine seriously this problem and for a committee of the Senate to be established to ask these experts, whose opinions are contradictory, to testify and give their sources of information so that this committee could draw conclusions which, in my opinion, would be objective and in the interest of all Canadians, and more particularly of Quebecers?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, this reminds me of an experience of a committee of the Senate, the Committee on Finance, a few years ago when we decided to bring in so-called experts from everywhere in the world. We had economists from Japan, West Germany, Great Britain and the United States, as well as heads of economics departments from our Canadian universities, and these many experts gave us contradictory evidence to such a point that we no longer knew which way to turn.

I like the idea behind the question asked by my honourable friend, but I believe he should not entertain any such illusion as to expect experts to agree on an issue as complex as that one.

As far as the Economic Council of Canada's view is concerned, the Honourable Mr. Lalonde expressed his disagreement some days ago. I assume other statements on that subject will be made in the near future. However, expert opinions should not be taken at face value, because, as a lawyer, Senator Asselin is very much aware that before the courts, experts are not always in agreement, although under oath, and they often give rise to criticism.

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary that is also a question of privilege, honourable senators. There seems to be an attempt once more to minimize the significance and role of this house. More and more people talk of changing the Senate, its structures, its goals, its objectives. Indeed this should be a question for the Senate to scrutinize and study in depth.

We have here people in authority—the Economic Council of Canada is in my view an authoritative body—used to making serious studies, but on the other hand you have . . . Senator Lamontagne has something to say. Do you wish to rise?

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I wanted to suggest this was not a study published by the Economic Council but a study made by two experts for the Economic Council.

Senator Asselin: It is the same thing.

Senator Lamontagne: No.

Senator Asselin: They were retained by the Economic Council, and I submit the Economic Council is responsible for allowing the publication of studies that go contrary to the views of the minister's experts. It amounts to the same thing. There is no point in stopping me and putting questions, interrupting. It amounts to the same thing, Senator Lamontagne.

My suggestion is, therefore, that the Senate's role is precisely to clarify such situations in an objective way. Honourable senators, we have here the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations who is debating with and confronting Quebec. Because he indicates he has studies pointing to such and such a thing; and on the other hand, there is the Economic Council of Canada, whose experts are appointed by the same government, and contradict what the minister and his experts are saying. It seems to me this is precisely the type of situation where the Senate should step in and set up an independent committee that would clarify all this, and inform the people on that matter.

Senator Langlois: Certainly my honourable friend did not understand my answer. I was agreeing with his suggestion, and I so stated. I even expressed the hope that such a motion would come forward. I hope he puts that motion forward. I will be quite happy myself to comply with the Senate's decision, and even to sit on such a committee.

THE SENATE

SUPPORT SERVICES FOR SENATORS—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, may I address a question to the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning a broader base of support services for senators? It has been my experience, since I have been here, that the support services at our disposal, to enable us to do our job, are little or insignificant. I wonder if the acting leader could indicate if there is any discussion taking place on improving the support services available to senators so that they can broaden the base of investigation, or whatever it is their job to do. I hope he can give me an answer beyond any suggestion that such a matter would be the responsibility of the Internal Economy Committee. Are we in fact going to get the support services to enable us to do our job, and carry out our increasing responsibilities?

Senator Langlois: If I understand the question of the honourable senator correctly, he is referring to support services such as the research which is provided for individual senators wishing to study a particular subject or problem. I am all in favour of this. Of course, I have to say that this question should be brought to the attention of the Internal Economy

Committee, and I will do this myself as a member of that committee. I am in favour of the suggestion of the honourable senator, and my hope is that one day we will get the kind of service referred to by him.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, by way of a supplementary question, I should like to refer to the greatly increased support staff in the other place. Under their program university students are brought in to assist members to research various aspects of legislation. I would ask the acting leader if, beyond the terms of reference of our Internal Economy Committee, such a program could be considered for this house, because it would enhance our ability to show Canadians what can be done by the Senate, of which I am so proud.

Senator Langlois: I repeat that I favour the suggestion put forward by my honourable friend, but I must say again that we cannot escape going before the Internal Economy Committee to get the necessary funds for this purpose. I am ready to support this suggestion, and I hope I will have the support of all members of that committee.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I am delighted to hear the response of the distinguished Acting Leader of the Government. I wonder if he could assure us that his philosophy, with which I am sure we all agree, could be actively supported in the hope of its being implemented by whatever means may be necessary. It would be very much to the credit of the Senate if the kind of support services that he and my colleague agree upon as desirable could be brought about. I would simply ask him if he knows of some means by which the Senate as a whole could bring about this desirable result.

Senator Langlois: I can only repeat that the Internal Economy Committee is the body to which we should put such a proposal, and let me say again that I am ready to lend my support to this suggestion. As the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee is in the chamber this evening, I shall take this opportunity to serve notice on him that he is going to hear from me in this respect very soon.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I thank the Acting Leader of the Government for reminding me that it is possible under our rules to direct a question to a committee chairman. Perhaps the very distinguished Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee would consider dealing with this question, namely, what the Internal Economy Committee can do to bring to fruition the desires shared by the Acting Leader of the Government and my colleague, and no doubt by many other distinguished and able senators.

Senator Laird: The honourable senator is aware, of course, as is his deskmate, of the research facilities available to all senators individually through the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament. It is the right of any senator who wishes a matter researched to ask for help in that respect from the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament.

As to the other matter, if one is going to make any progress, I have to know specifically what proposals would be suggested.

For example, it was suggested that interns be assigned to senators such as those available to members of the House of Commons. Well, all I can say is that I would be happy to do that provided it does not cost any money.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, let me say that I appreciate very much the excellent services available through the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament. My question is not meant to imply the slightest criticism of those services, which are so willingly and ably rendered. However, all the research they can do is not going to help me find someone to assist me to get down on paper any views I might have as a result of that research.

Senator Laird: It depends entirely on what you want researched.

Senator Buckwold: Or what you might want to say.

Senator Laird: The starting point has to be a request on your part to get down on paper some information on a given topic. That is how you would go about it.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I am sure the honourable senator did not wish to misunderstand my question. It is my fault that he has. My question was really directed to those support services such as secretarial help, and so forth, that are available to the ordinary senator—and I consider myself at least an ordinary senator—to enable him to get on paper what he might want to say based on the research he has received.

It seems to me that the Internal Economy Committee might well direct itself to the problem of senators who want to take an active part in the day-to-day work of the Senate but whose desires in that respect are somewhat restrained by the lack of secretarial and similar services available to them.

Senator Laird: The honourable senator no doubt appreciates that the reason there is not a flock of secretaries for each senator is one of economics. It is purely a monetary matter. For example, I share a secretary with two other senators, and I am a reasonably busy senator. This is purely for monetary reasons.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to comment on Senator Laird's remarks. He said that I had suggested that interns be assigned to individual senators, and he assumed that I was aware of the research facilities available to honourable senators in the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament. Well, the Research Branch is working on three projects for me right now. But I do not have enough secretarial help to answer my mail, and I do not have enough help in respect of researching Hansard so that I can follow up matters and assure the people in my part of Canada that the Senate is protecting their rights and giving sober second thought to legislation. There is just too much to do in certain parts of the country, particularly the poorer parts.

To say that money is not available is absolutely ridiculous. The members of the other place have had the allocation of funds for secretarial help increased to $46,000, $10,000 in the district, and a constituency office. Certainly we should get some small portion of a similar amount so that we are better able to do the job we are supposed to do. I cannot accept the statement that there is no money available.

Senator Laird: I might inform honourable senators that the interns assigned to members of the House of Commons are not paid out of public funds; they are paid by private institutions that send them to Parliament to gain experience, probably in connection with a university course.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, we have had an excellent response from the Acting Leader of the Government, and this matter should be followed through. I should like to see a general debate in the Senate on this question because I think the need for support services is very great. We cannot function here with two senators sharing one secretary. We cannot do our job of representing regions if we do not have adequate secretarial and research assistance.

The other day I looked up certain amounts spent by Parliament in a year. The House of Commons spent $59 million, the Senate spent $10 million, and the Library of Parliament spent $4 million. The amount spent by all committees of the Senate totalled $440,000, while the research offices attached to the caucuses in the other place spent more than $330,000. Senators are working virtually without any help.

It is not good enough to say that the Library can prepare a research paper. They can prepare a good research paper on an item coming up in a month or two, but they are relatively useless if you phone them up and want some research done quickly on some event that is happening, say, in Congress in Washington. They get the Congressional Record a month after it is produced. What the Library does, and does well, is no substitute for the kind of research help we need.

The House of Commons is spending additional sums of money to provide services for its members, but we do not have the gumption to ask for the kind of appropriation that we need to do a job for the Senate.

I was trying to get regional offices established for senators, but what did the Government of Canada say a year ago, or two years ago? They said, "No regional offices for senators. Senators don't represent regions." The message I get is that the powers that be don't want senators to represent regions, and then they say we are not doing an adequate job and they want to get rid of us.

I suggest that the Senate should take a stand on this question. The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration should put in the Senate estimates sufficient money to provide the kind of support services that senators need in order to serve the country.

● (2030)

Senator Laird: I will keep that in mind.

Senator Flynn: That was not a question.

SHIPPING CONFERENCES EXEMPTION BILL, 1979SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. P. Derek Lewis moved the second reading of Bill S-6, to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, although I have been a member of this house for some months, this is the first opportunity I have had to move the second reading of a bill, and I feel deeply honoured. I would also take this opportunity to thank Madam Speaker and all members of this chamber for the welcome and the many kindnesses and courtesies shown to me following my call to this house. I now ask your indulgence on this, my first presentation.

Honourable senators, a shipping conference is an association of ocean carriers, operating scheduled services in the same area, which regulates rates, charges and conditions governing the transportation by its members of goods by water.

Shipping conferences usually have a permanent organization, constituted under an agreement by all members, governing membership, voting, meetings, admissions, violations, penalties and such like. Since such an organization has as its object the limiting of competition among its members it, in effect, constitutes a cartel, although not a monopoly, since a distinction has to be made between a shipping conference and carriers competing in the same trades, but operating outside the conference system, and carriers in the bulk trades, such as oil, coal and grain. The conferences system exists worldwide, and has been in operation for more than 100 years. As of December 31, 1977, there were 50 inbound and outbound conferences active in the Canadian trades.

Because of the nature of shipping conferences, there have been several government investigations into conference practices, starting as early as 1913. In 1965, after a comprehensive study on conference practices, the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission concluded that conferences operated as cartels, contrary to the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, but that the public interest would not be served by excessive rate competition and instability in the liner trades. As a result, Parliament enacted the Shipping Conferences Exemptions Act, which came into force on April 1, 1971, and is due to expire on March 31, 1979, following an extension of five years.

The object of Bill S-6 is to provide continued exemption for certain shipping practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, to take effect on April 1, 1979, on the expiration of the existing exemption act.

With the present act due to expire early next year, the government carried out a review of conference operations, and concluded that the activities of the shipping conferences under the Shipping Conferences Exemptions Act, continue to serve the public interest. In particular, the conference system has produced a measure of rate and service stability. The conference lines have established standards of performance and sufficient capacity to cope with normal surges in demand. In addition, the conference system produces a return on carrier investment stable enough to encourage the employment of modern vessels and new technology.

A recent enquiry conducted by the Canadian Transport Commission solicited the views of the Canadian private sector concerning shipping conference practices. The general consensus of the briefs submitted, from both ocean carriers and shippers of goods, was that conferences should be provided with continued exemption from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, subject to certain safeguards. It also concluded that the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act has had a measure of success in achieving the purpose for which it was passed.

Honourable senators, the present act spells out those conference practices, such as the charging of a common tariff, that are exempted from the Combines Investigation Act. At the same time, the act lists those practices, such as rebating where a patronage contract applies, that are not exempted.

In addition, the act requires conferences to file with the Canadian Transport Commission all relevant documents, such as agreements and tariffs, and specifies the penalties if the provisions of the act are not adhered to. The basic approach has been to permit conferences to operate freely in Canadian trades, but subject to certain requirements designed to protect the public interest.

Bill S-6 is based on this model. It sets out clearly those conference practices that are acceptable and those that are unacceptable, providing guidelines for the conferences, which can operate with the assurance that they will not lose their exempt status from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act as long as they operate on the basis of these rules. At the same time, however, it has become clear that a number of changes are desirable to ensure that the national interest is fully served.

For example, while the most appropriate role for government is to monitor the activities of conferences, and to act only if it is clear that their activities are prejudicial to the public interest, the present act does not provide specific authority to act in this respect. Bill S-6 makes specific reference to section 23 of the National Transportation Act, by providing that any contract, agreement or arrangement which is required to be filed with the Canadian Transport Commission, of any practice of a member of a conference, that has the effect of restricting competition to a degree that exceeds the restriction required to ensure a reasonable degree of rate or service stability is prejudicial to the public interest. This brings into effect the regulatory authority contained in section 23 of the National Transportation Act.

Secondly, it is important that the public interest be protected by providing the government with sufficient power to obtain any data that may be necessary to identify and correct any prejudicial features.

While it is expected that such provisions would be used only as a last resort, and after conferences have had an opportunity to comment, Bill S-6 provides the Governor in Council with power to make regulations requiring member carriers of a shipping conference to produce sufficient information to ensure effective supervision of conference activities.

To clarify the status of inter-conference agreements and agreements between conferences and independent lines, provisions have been included in the bill exempting them from the Combines Investigation Act, and requiring them to be filed with the Canadian Transport Commission. This requirement will allow such agreements to be made public, and will permit detailed analysis of their implications.

It is considered unrealistic to expect all interested parties to visit the Canadian Transport Commission offices in the capital to examine tariffs and agreements, and, as it is not feasible to provide copies of these documents to the public, Bill S-6 requires each conference to maintain an office or agency in that region of Canada in which it operates where copies of all documents filed with the commission may be made available. It is believed that such provisions will make filed information more accessible to shippers.

To improve access to conferences for Canadian exporters, the bill requires members of outbound shipping conferences to meet with designated shippers' groups when reasonably requested by the groups to do so, and to provide information sufficient for the satisfactory conduct of such a meeting.

To keep pace with changes in technology and the world situation, it is felt that this measure should be reviewed in five years. An expiry date of March 31, 1984 has, therefore, been incorporated in the bill with powers of extension to ensure that conference practices are subject to such a review.

The present act requires that the prescribed documents be filed with the Canadian Transport Commission not later than 30 days after they are adopted by the conference, but in many cases the Commission has experienced difficulty in establishing the date of adoption. To correct this situation, Bill S-6 requires each amendment to a document to be filed no later than its effective date, permitting documents to be more easily monitored and ensuring that tariffs on file with the Commission are up to date.

The present restriction of certification powers of the chairman or secretary of a conference has created some problems when either or both are absent, or when such positions do not exist. Bill S-6 would broaden the authority to certify documents to include any official duly appointed by members of a conference.

Finally, it is considered that the fines and deposits in the punishments and security provisions are unrealistically low, and appropriate changes have been made in this bill.

While a number of countries, including Canada, carry out periodic reviews of the activities of shipping conferences, most of them continue to support the liner conference concept.

In closing, honourable senators, it is my belief that this bill provides an appropriate balance between the needs of shippers and the needs of the conference members. It provides adequate safeguards to protect the public interest and the necessary framework to permit the conference members to provide a measure of rate and service stability in the volatile world of ocean shipping. Accordingly, I request your support for second reading of this bill.

Senator Lang: I must apologize to the honourable sponsor of the bill for not having looked at it, but I have two specific questions which spring from my own ignorance of the area of activity involved. First, is this the first time we have introduced legislation to exempt these conferences from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act?

Secondly, the honourable senator mentioned that each conference has to keep an office in Canada. With the lack of shipping companies operating under the Canadian flag, I am wondering how we could conceivably enforce such a provision. These conferences are internationally independent. Are we not whistling in the dark?

Senator Lewis: Senator, in answer to your first question, this bill is to replace an act which was passed in 1970, and which will expire next March. On your second question, although there is not much Canadian shipping, this bill provides that those conferences which are going to operate into Canada, and which wish to avail themselves of the exemption of these practices, must maintain an office here.

Senator Lang: In other words, they are conferences that are shipping goods into Canada and carrying goods out of Canada?

Senator Lewis: This applies to the conferences carrying goods out of Canada. As I understand it, the reverse applies in countries from which they carry goods to Canada.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I should like to ask the honourable sponsor a question which really relates to the philosophy of the bill. Before doing so, I should like to congratulate him very much on his clear and vigorous delivery. I regret that anything I might ask should in any way interfere with the excellent impression that I am sure he has made upon every member of the Senate.

I have read this bill without very much success in understanding it. I should like to ask how its philosophy is compatible with the philosophy of bills which the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has been dealing with in the last two sessions, and I would refer specifically to the Competition Bill. The vigorous enforcers of the Combines Investigation Act were eager to give explicit approval to what is to me a clear combination of shippers to make certain that there is a very limited degree of competition on the seas.

Senator Lewis: Honourable senator, I appreciate your question. First, I must admit that I am not too familiar with the bills that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has been studying. However, on the question of competition, I would say that this is the reason for the exemption. It is thought that if it were not for the exemption provisions, then these practices could possibly be in contravention of the competition legislation.

However, the philosophy, as I understand it, is that it has been found for over 100 years that it is necessary for shipping lines to operate these conferences to enable the industry to be able to operate, and this fact has been given worldwide recognition. As I said in my presentation, this was of concern to the government, which carried out a number of investigations, starting in 1913, for this very reason. It was found necessary for carriers to operate in this way in order to provide some stability, and also to provide them a reasonable return on the huge investment which is now becoming necessary if they are to continue to provide scheduled services. I would like to emphasize the word "scheduled" since it is the scheduled lines that this applies to, and not the tramp steamers and unscheduled shipping companies.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I thank the honourable senator for his answer and congratulate him upon its content, with one exception. I happened to notice that he was not able to reconcile his explanation with the principles in the Combines Investigation Act. However, I realize that is probably beyond the ability of anybody to do, and since I really do not understand the bill myself, and since my colleague from Newfoundland on my right probably understands it better than I do, I beg the leave of honourable senators to move adjournment of this debate in the name of Senator Marshall.

On motion of Senator Smith (Colchester), for Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Andrew Thompson moved the second reading of Bill S-7, to implement conventions between Canada and the Republic of Korea and Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and an agreement between Canada and Jamaica for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to implement conventions between Canada and the Republic of Korea and Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and an agreement between Canada and Jamaica for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax. In addition, the bill provides that the Governor in Council may, subject to a resolution of Parliament, give effect by Order-in-Council to any supplementary conventions or agreements.

At the time of tax reform in 1972 Canada had 16 tax treaties in force. The number is now 24, because I was informed by the department this evening that Morocco has ratified an agreement. It is expected that some 40 other countries will be added to that list.

As I said previously in the case of similar legislation approved by Parliament over the past two and a half years, this bill contains a Part which deals with supplementary conventions or agreements, and that is Part IV which is to be found on pages 3 to 6 inclusive. That Part is designed to ensure that the past treaties be kept up to date as a result of changes in the tax systems of Canada and the other countries. The mechanisms provided for so doing under this bill are similar to those provided in previous bills.

The three tax treaties under review follow the general pattern of the recent treaties previously concluded with other countries. They also follow, to a large extent, the format and language of the model Double Taxation Convention prepared by the Committee of Fiscal Affairs of OECD. Two of the treaties, the one with the United Kingdom and the one with Jamaica, when in force, will replace existing agreements respectively signed in 1966 and 1971.

The text of Bill S-7 which, as I said before, is modelled on the draft Double Taxation Convention prepared by the OECD, is divided into six Parts under the headings "Scope of the Convention", "Definitions", "Taxation of Income", "Methods for Prevention of Double Taxation", "Special Provisions", and "Final Provisions."

There are slight differences to reflect the tax policies of each of the respective countries, and I would suggest, having read the reports of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, that the members are very familiar with this format, and here I have in mind particularly Senator Walker who, for Senator Grosart, raised questions in that committee which I have read. The committee dealt with the first treaty bills to come before us. I think I should point out that there are some differences between the agreements to which this bill relates and the agreement with the United Kingdom signed in 1966 and the agreement with Jamaica signed in 1971.

The treaties, as I think all honourable senators know, generally provide that dividends can be taxed in the country of source at a maximum rate of 15 per cent. In the case of the United Kingdom, the rate is nil when dividends are received from a foreign affiliate of the Canadian enterprise, and in the case of Jamaica, in the same circumstances, their rate is set, as in the existing agreement, at 22½ per cent. I understand that for the developing countries the dividends are a source of revenue, and it was explained to me that Jamaica has as its domestic rate 37½ per cent, so it was felt that there was some generosity on their part in bringing it down to 22½ per cent. A new feature in the United Kingdom treaty is a provision ensuring that Canadian individuals and non-controlling corporations will receive a refund of the United Kingdom Advanced Corporation Tax.

A general rate of 15 per cent is provided for in the case of interest originating in one country and paid to a resident of the other country. Certain types of interest—for example, interest paid to the Export Development Corporation—are exempted in the source country. The 1966 agreement with the United Kingdom already provided for a 15 per cent rate while the one with Jamaica, the 1971 agreement, did not put any ceiling on the Canadian rate.

With respect to royalties, the conventions provide for a general rate of 10 per cent, except that the one with Korea provides for a rate of 15 per cent. The 1966 agreement with the United Kingdom also provided for a 10 per cent rate, while the one with Jamaica provided for a 12½ per cent rate in the case of Jamaica and no ceiling in the case of Canada. The conventions with the United Kingdom and Jamaica also provide for an exemption in the case of copyright royalties.

So far as the other matters set out in the tax treaties are concerned, they are essentially similar. The provisions in the three treaties relating to capital gains, for example, are in line with the Canadian policy preserving the right of the source country to tax gains arising on the sale of real property, business assets and shares in real estate companies.

In the area of non-discrimination, discrimination based on the concept of nationality is prohibited under all the treaties. This will ensure a fair and equal treatment in the three countries concerned. On the other hand, fiscal incentives based on the concept of residence, such as the small business deduction and the dividend tax credit in Canada, will not be affected. They will not have to be extended to non-residents.

I remember the matter of teachers being brought up by the honourable senator who is the President of Dalhousie University (Senator Hicks) with respect to an imbalance of foreign teachers in faculties across Canada, and the attractions in hiring foreign teachers. In line with the White Paper on Tax Reform, no special concession for teachers from abroad is included in the tax treaties. In fact, the new treaty with the United Kingdom removes the provision, contained in the 1966 agreement, granting a two-year tax exemption for teachers. The unilateral exemption granted Canadian teachers in Jamaica has also been removed in the new treaty with Jamaica.

Coming to pensions, I think the following aspect respecting the United Kingdom was discussed when the treaty with Italy was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Canada has preserved its right to tax pensions paid to residents of the three countries included in this bill. In the case of the United Kingdom—and I mention this because of its relationship to the case of Italy—with which country we have an agreement, there is a special provision whereby Canada or the United Kingdom will exercise that right only if the pension paid in a year exceeds $10,000. The country in which the recipient of the pension resides retains its full taxing rights.

The provision in the treaties dealing with methods for eliminating double taxation is a very important one. Double taxation of foreign source income of Canadian residents is alleviated by way of a foreign tax credit. In addition, an exemption is granted for certain dividends received from a foreign affiliate of a Canadian company. In order to promote the flow of capital and investment, the tax treaties also ensure that proper relief will be granted in Korea, the United Kingdom and Jamaica in respect of taxes paid in Canada.

The tax treaties with Korea and Jamaica contain an additional feature commonly referred to as a "tax-sharing provision". Under such a provision, the tax incentives granted by those countries under pioneer industry legislation will directly benefit Canadian residents. This is achieved by Canada's agreeing to take into account, for the purposes of computing the foreign tax credit, the amount of tax which would have been payable in the absence of the special incentive legislation.

Honourable senators, I have not gone into further detail because—and I have mentioned this to Senator Hayden—I believe the appropriate forum for discussing this measure in detail is the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It is my intention to move that the bill be referred to that committee if it receives second reading.

On balance, the terms of the tax treaties provide an equitable solution to the various problems of double taxation existing between Canada and the countries to which this bill refers. Therefore, I commend the measure to the favourable consideration of this house.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I may ask the sponsor of the bill, or perhaps the Acting Leader of the Government, if any consideration has been given to the suggestion that this bill, and all such bills dealing with conventions, agreements and possibly treaties—the word "treaty" has been used here, although there is some doubt as to whether that is a proper use of the word—should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs rather than the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

I have no particular objection to its going to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, but where it is a clear case of a treaty, or an international agreement between countries, it seems to me it is time we reconsidered the practice of sending the bill to that committee. Without prejudice, it seems to me that the bill is one that should go to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, personally I would have no objection to the bill's being referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee. I assumed, because of the practice of referring similar bills to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, that this bill should also be referred to that committee. However, I too see the logic of referring it to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps the sponsor of the bill will discuss that before making a motion at some later stage in the progress of the bill through the Senate. I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Dawson had been substituted for that of Mr. Daudlin on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN SENATE GALLERY OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as previously announced, the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech in the other place tomorrow, Thursday, November 16, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

May I be permitted to remind honourable senators that none but senators will be admitted to the Senate Gallery of the House of Commons on that occasion. This step is being taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible. In this manner, senators will not be excluded from the gallery on account of many of the places being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

May I add that such instructions were first issued in 1931 by the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, and that this practice has been followed ever since by succeeding Speakers.

Senator Langlois tabled:

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

VOLUME II OF REPORT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table a committee report entitled "Canada-United States Relations—Volume II—Canada's Trade Relations with the United States."

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, as honourable senators will recall, was authorized in the last session of this Parliament to continue to examine and report upon Canada's relations with the United States.

Honourable senators, with your leave, I would ask your permission to say a few words in explanation of the report at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators will recall that the Foreign Affairs Committee has been studying Canada-U.S. relations for some years. Two or three years ago we tabled and published Volume I of the report relative to the institutional framework for the relationship, whereupon, on the further authorization of this chamber, we launched upon the study relative to Volume II, which involved our trade relations with the United States.

I shall not read to you in detail the last order of reference relative to the continuing study of our trade relations, which was in November of 1977, but I would remind honourable senators that on June 20, 1978, the Senate gave the committee leave to publish its report during an adjournment of the Senate, which was done early in August of this year.

During the course of the study of Canada-U.S. trade relations, the committee heard some 101 witnesses over 44 sittings. I do not wish to take up much time this afternoon, as I know there are two important committee hearings when the Senate rises, but for the record I should like to name and thank some of the organizations and individuals who made our report possible by the evidence they were willing to bring before the committee. Many government departments, of course, are included in this list. I will not name all of them, but certainly the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce gave us unstinting assistance.

The following organizations were represented, without exception, by their presidents: the Automotive Parts Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Export Association, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Travel Industry Association of Canada, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business—Mr. Bulloch—the Motor Vehicle Manufacturers Association of the United States, and so forth.

In addition, honourable senators, we received testimony from some of Canada's labour organizations, and in each case they were kind enough to be represented by their presidents or chief executive officers. They included Mr. Dennis McDermott, then head of the United Auto Workers of Canada, now, of course, President of the CLC; Mr. Lynn Williams of the United Steel Workers of America; Mr. L. H. Lorrain, President of Canadian Paperworkers Union, and Senator Edward Lawson of this house, who appeared not as a senator but in his capacity as a director of the Canadian Conference of Teamsters.

I might say it was a deliberate decision of the committee to seek evidence from chief executive officers and presidents of Canada's major corporations involved in Canada-U.S. trade, our feeling being that these people would be in a position to give frank testimony without having to answer to too many masters. It is not an exhaustive list at all, but I will name some of these familiar individuals to you: Mr. David Culver, President and Chief Executive Officer of the Aluminum Company of Canada; Mr. Alfred Powis of Noranda; a man like Mr. R. D. Southern of ATCO Industries Ltd.; Mr. Robert Scrivener of Northern Telecom, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer; Mr. W. John Stenason of Canadian Pacific Investments Ltd.; Mr. Ian Barclay, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer, British Columbia Forest Products Limited; Mr. Roy Bennett, President of Ford Motor Company of Canada; Mr. J. D. Allan, President of the Steel Company of Canada; several presidents of smaller companies: Mr. William Mounfield, President of Massey-Ferguson; Mr. A. J. Foote, President, Canadian Chemical Producers Association; Mr. Franklin McCarthy, President, Du Pont of Canada, Ltd.; Mr. David W. Barr, President of Moore Corporation Limited, one of our great multinational Canadian companies; Professor Abraham Rotstein who has been Chairman of the Committee for an Independent Canada; Mr. A. Yoya Peters, President of Michelin Tires.

Honourable senators, that will give you some idea of the quality of individuals who were prepared to come forward with their associates, with well-prepared briefs, before a Senate committee. I think it speaks well for the Senate and the reputation of our committee work in this place that men and organizations such as those I have named are prepared to give so unstintingly of their time in the preparation of a report such as this.

I cannot go further without paying tribute to my Deputy Chairman, Senator Allister Grosart, and all members of the committee who were conscientious in their attendance throughout the hearings and in drafting the report.

While acknowledgments of staff and others are set forth in the report, I should like particularly to single out Mr. Peter Dobell and Mrs. Carol Seaborn of the Parliamentary Centre who put in extraordinary hours particularly during the drafting and preparation of the report, quite apart from the ordinary work they did during our hearings. And, of course, we had unreserved assistance from the Research Branch of the Parliamentary Library.

● (1410)

When we took upon ourselves the job of studying Canada-United States trade, we knew that as we are, per capita, one of the world's greatest trading nations and as our standard of living depends on this, and as 70 per cent of that immense trade is done with one nation, namely, the United States, we could not study this subject without studying, in effect, the economy of Canada. We had, however, to place various strictures on ourselves so that we would not find ourselves digressing up every rivulet and side road that one can imagine, or our study could have gone on for 20 years.

We did, however, cover the Canadian economy in broad general terms, relating it as much as humanly possible to our trade with the United States, but leaving from that study the subject of agriculture—and I include fisheries in that, in which we do not have a large trade with the United States, although we do with other countries—and leaving aside energy, which we did not deal with as it is highly controlled by government regulation and would really, as we say in the report, warrant a study of its own relative to all its aspects: oil, gas, nuclear energy, water, uranium, coal, and so forth.

Other than that, the study covered the Canadian industrial sector as impacted by our relationship with the United States, and was as broad as we could make it.

Since publishing the report in early August we have had good and fair press coverage, some of it critical, some of it favourable, but at least very broad coverage, some of which has been distributed to members of the committee. Other members of the Senate may be interested in it and I will see when we have it all gathered together that it is distributed to you. We mailed out by direct mail to individually named persons some 5,000 copies of the report, and we have received requests for approximately 1,000 additional copies since its publication.

The main recommendation of the report, and I will only read the one at the conclusion of the report, might be described as a controversial recommendation which has given rise to comment. It reads:

The committee urges governments in Canada, as well as the business and labour communities, to assess without prejudice Canada's present economic prospects, the alternative solutions and their consequences. The committee recommends that they consider seriously the option of bilateral free trade with the United States.

I would remind honourable senators, however, that that is not the only recommendation in the report. For those who may dismiss that recommendation out of hand as being something they do not agree with, I would ask you, however, still to consider the report as a reference work in many other areas, including the some 30 general observations and recommendations that are contained in it on a broad range of matters including the resource sector, tourism, the auto pact, and so forth.

I will not take the time now to give you a résumé of the report. You have all received copies of it. Obviously you may read either all of it or those parts of it that are of particular interest to you, but I will later today put into circulation a speech which I have given twice in the last two or three weeks. Recently I gave it to the Canadian Export Association, and I gave a similar speech last night to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. The speech relates to the report and gives some arguments of my own in support of the report's principal recommendation. You may find that speech of interest; it is not a résumé of the report itself.

Later today I will seek a continued mandate for our study. I will also place a Notice of Motion on the order paper for discussion of the report.

Thank you very much for your indulgence at this time.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX REBATE—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, since the Minister of National Revenue, Senator Guay, is here, I take this opportunity to ask him a question, particularly as the Prime Minister announced yesterday that there will be a cabinet shuffle soon, which means perhaps that we might no longer enjoy the privilege of having with us a minister in charge of a department.

My question concerns Bill C-46 which we passed in the last session and which relates to the discounting of tax over-payments. The Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, after studying this bill, reached the conclusion that it should be entirely redrafted. We were then in the same situation as for Bill C-8 concerning amendments to the Labour Code; we had to act fast because the tax rebate period was expiring and general elections were expected soon, as the government leader and others in this house and outside kept repeating.

So yesterday I quoted the government leader exactly and think it could not be clearer. But, in any event, we had to pass this bill in a hurry for the same reasons as for Bill C-8. The Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce had said that this bill should be redrafted and recommended that it be planned in cooperation with the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

So I ask the minister, the Honourable Senator Guay, if the drafting of a new bill has been undertaken so that the new legislation be clearer, more efficient and better tailored to the situation.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I appreciate the question put to me by the opposition leader, Senator Flynn. I suppose he is taking this opportunity to remind me of what was said at the time. I also remember the fact that I had asked my officials to undertake a study of that bill. But I should also emphasize that I appreciate the fact that the Senate had passed that bill at my request, particularly on the same day, which was around April 15, as it was necessary to do our job.

Honourable senators may rest assured that I will give a more comprehensive answer tomorrow.

THE CONSTITUTION

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the First Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.)

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Molson.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I want first to thank Senator Flynn for yielding to enable me to make my remarks on this subject at this time. I appreciate his courtesiousness.

I rise with considerable trepidation and reluctance to take part in the debate on the consideration of the First Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution. My colleagues know that I am not a lawyer, and certainly no one would ever suggest that I am a constitutional expert or even that I have any great knowledge on the subject. However, I feel justified in taking part in this debate because, having been a member of the Senate for a considerable length of time, I have seen a good deal of the development of the negative attitude of the media, the House of Commons and the public towards the Senate. I hesitate to think that it is nearly 23 years since I first came here and that there are now only four senators still in the chamber who were here when I was appointed. I was part of the largest group that ever came into the Senate at one time. We were 13 in number, and our group included Senators Donald Cameron, David Croll, Elsie Inman, D'Arcy Leonard, Harold Connolly, Fred McGrand, Donald Smith, John Hackett, C. G. Power, Jean-François Pouliot, Calixte Savoie, William Wall, and myself.

● (1430)

Another reason why I would like to add a few observations on the subject of the Senate's role in the Constitution is the fact that I have great respect and considerable affection for the Senate. The respect stems from the quality of character of its members, and the affection as a result of the invariable courtesy, kindness and friendship shown to me through all my years in this chamber.

I believe that the Senate is serving a vital role. I think it fills its proper place in the Parliament of Canada—a place for which it was designed. While some reform is desirable, the idea of its abolition is unsound and, in fact, in the absence of a more effective chamber, foolish.

We should ask ourselves why the Senate has become so unpopular. Why do the media go to such pains to downgrade anything we do? Why do they not give any credit for tasks, useful tasks, well carried out?

If we are honest with ourselves, we have to realize that it is because of the image that we project. There is something very wrong with our image. It is said that we are not carrying out the role for which the Senate was created. I do not think that is true, but it is being repeated so often that it is taken for fact.

The Senate was instituted in our parliamentary system for two main reasons: first, to give sober second thought to legislation and, secondly, to represent regions from which the senators are appointed on a provincial basis. It is now said that we are not carrying out, in particular, the second of these roles. There are other reasons—perhaps many of them—why we are so frequently criticized, but I would like to suggest to you, my colleagues, that the greatest reason for criticism, the reason that one hears most frequently, is that we are merely a rubber stamp for the political party to which we belong. It is suggested that we are paying more attention to the interests of the party than to those of the country; that we are only appointed for partisan political purposes and for political reward. This has been said far too often to be disregarded.

As one of many examples, I would draw your attention to a speech on November 1, 1974, by Mr. Allan McKinnon, M.P. for Victoria, which is recorded on page 985 of the House of Commons Hansard, in which he lists all those associated with the national campaign headquarters of the Liberal Party. He is criticizing the Senate for its political activity, and he lists, among those actively engaged, Senators Gildas Molgat, Raymond Perrault, Earl Hastings, Jean-Pierre Côté, Lorne Bonnell, John Aird, Sidney Buckwold, Douglas Everett, Louis Gélinas, Louis Giguère, Harry Hays, Dan Riley, Irvine Barrow and George van Roggen. He goes on to say that these appointments were made only to further the interests of the party.

Of course, these remarks were brought up in connection with the election campaign which he said was being directed by Senator Keith Davey. He could have added many other names in other political contexts, and today he could add all the names of this year's campaign committee now at work.

It is my belief that when appointments are made to the Senate, and from that time onward, political activity should, within Parliament at least, cease as far as all members of the Senate are concerned. This does not suggest that the method of appointment should necessarily be changed, although I do agree that some appointments should be made by the provinces.

The idea that the second chamber should be independent is not new. It goes back to pre-Confederation days. The development of its partisan approach is the thing which has taken place over the years and, in consequence, changed the way the Senate was designed to carry out its parliamentary role. We can take Sir John A. Macdonald as an authority in this regard.

Sir John A., when he was Attorney General of Canada West, said this about the Senate:

There would be no use of an Upper House if it did not exercise, when it thought proper, the right of opposing, or amending or postponing the legislation of the Lower House. It would be of no value whatever were it a mere Chamber for registering the decrees of the Lower House. It must be an independent House, having a free action of its own, for it is only valuable as being a regulating body, calmly considering the legislation initiated by the popular branch, and preventing any hasty or ill-considered legislation which may come from that body.

To be impartial, let us also look at a Liberal authority, a distinguished colleague and, in my opinion, a wise man. Senator Arthur Roebuck in an article on the Senate in 1954 wrote:

In my opinion the strength of the Senate lies in the independence of its members.

He wrote also:

The members of the upper chamber are not dependent on either the government or the civil service. Senators are not seeking promotion or anything else. They have nothing to hope for and nothing to fear. They are as secure in their positions as judges on the bench.

I do not want to bore you with too many quotations, but I do want to impress on you that independence and impartiality were expected to prevail in the Senate. I have one more quotation from another undisputed authority, a former leader of this chamber, Senator Paul Martin, who, in turn, quoted the words of the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, another former Leader of the Government in the Senate and a former Prime Minister of Canada. Senator Martin, having quoted the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, went on to say:

With those words—occupying the same role as he occupied—I find myself in this first foray in our discussion in full agreement.

Senator Martin was speaking in the debate on the Speech from the Throne on September 18, 1968.

Senator Flynn: He was a new member then.

Senator Molson: In that speech he quoted the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen as follows:

The Senate is worthless if it becomes merely another Commons, divided upon party lines, and indulging in party debates such as are familiar in the Lower Chamber, session after session. If the Senate ever permits itself to fulfill that function, and that alone, in the scheme of Confederation, then the sooner it is abolished the better. This practice is not to be deprecated in the House of Commons. If we are going to have a democracy, the practice must continue, there have to be parties and party manoeuvres, there have to be conflicts and controversies, innumerable in variety and wearisome in length. The great scheme of bringing sections together and letting each see the viewpoint of the other has to be worked out in the representative Chamber. Sometimes we are too impatient and critical of governments in allowing what seems inordinate time for discussion of public business. The discussion is good, but it is not the function of the Senate. Members of the second Chamber must get away, lift their minds from these hard-drawn lines of party, or they cannot serve their country. They have to make up their minds to give every government fair play and not to stand in the way of legislation unless they are convinced it must be defeated on its merits, and that the consequences of failure to defeat it would be serious.

Senator Flynn: Is that the end of the quotation?

Senator Molson: Yes.

Senator Flynn: I do not recognize Senator Martin there.

Senator Molson: The words I read were those of the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen as quoted by Senator Martin.

Senator Flynn: Oh, I see. I thought it must be something borrowed.

Senator Molson: The operative words are: "I fully agree."

Honourable senators, I should like to congratulate Senator Stanbury, Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution, for the excellent report presented on October 19, 1978, and on his first-class speech in explanation, and to say how gratified I am to learn that the study will continue. There is not the time, and I have not the knowledge, to deal with the whole list of constitutional changes of Bill C-60 other than those applying to the second chamber.

If you will bear with me, I should like to develop my views on this subject. You will see at once that many of my ideas are not original. I am happy to associate myself with so many of our colleagues who have put forward their views, and hope to reinforce, not steal, their suggestions.

First of all, I believe that we ourselves of the Senate must strive to change, by legislation if necessary, certain matters which have been proposed in several different forms. The first is the question of appointment. The Prime Minister, in the paper entitled The Constitution and the People of Canada brought out in February, 1969, prior to the Constitutional Conference of that year, recommended that some appointments be made on the recommendation of the provinces. The same recommendation has been made in the report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution in 1972, and would be supported, I believe, within the Senate. It would be a logical move, and perhaps some 30 to 50 per cent of appointments could be made in the same way as before, but from lists submitted by the provinces.

As I said earlier, I believe that what has brought the Senate's image into serious question is the partisan aspect of its actions. It is accused of merely echoing party wishes, rather than looking for the well-being of the country. My own view is that when a senator is appointed, he should then cease to have any loyalty except to his country. We must, of course, accept that his responsibility lies to a certain region or province of the country, and would expect his views and efforts to be in the direction of doing his best possible as its representative, but overall I would say that he should have no loyalty higher than that to his country. His independent view of what is best for society or the country should completely outweigh his loyalty to his party.

I would also suggest that the Senate be re-organized internally as already suggested by some of our colleagues, that it should have a chief or leader in the chamber elected by senators generally, and that the parties' positions be put forward by the government leader, who should be a cabinet minister, and an opposition leader. Other than the leaders and their deputies, there should be no other party activity within the Senate, and certainly no whips. I would repeat that once reaching the Senate, the appointee should leave behind his party ties, should no longer attend the general party caucuses, should not be an officer of any political party organization, and should not engage in partisan activities other than as a normal, non-parliamentary citizen. I know that this will be thought of as blasphemy by many of my colleagues, and I can understand it. I realize that it is easy for me to say this, but I suggest that if the Senate gave the impression of genuine devotion only to what, in its members' good judgment, is best for the country, the public would in time realize that we are here not to take but to give. I think the force of example would speak much louder than any words.

In this connection, Senator Buckwold speaking to the Canadian Club of Saskatoon, put forward a Senate reform proposal where party allegiance would have no place in the day-to-day working of the upper house. He went on to say that under his proposal, senators would still be appointed according to party allegiance, but party discipline would no longer play a role in the operation of the upper house. I quote from Senator Buckwold's speech:

Although party discipline in the Senate is not as strict as it is in the House of Commons, it is still present, which has an effect on Senate decisions.

And I quote further:

There were many issues on which, if it were not for the direction of the whip, I would have voted differently,

Senator Lamontagne: Name another one.

Senator Molson: Another what?

Senator Lamontagne: He said he would have voted otherwise.

Senator Molson: I am not going to suggest that all senators should join my party, because I am afraid there might be some reluctance, particularly since my honourable friend, Senator Forsey, described Independents as "loose fish or shaky fellows." When I was appointed, I was called a "mugwump" by Senator Hugessen, and when I said, "Explain" he told me it was a bird that sat on the fence with his mug on one side and his wump on the other. So, you can see that flattery will get you nowhere.

We have also been much criticized for not carrying out some reform of our own. In looking back I have discovered that in 1967 the Honourable John Connolly, then Government Leader in the Senate, asked senators for an expression of their views on the role of the Senate, and went into the matter at considerable length. Next, in 1968, the Honourable Paul Martin, Leader of the Government in the Senate, asked senators for their views on the role of the Senate. In correspondence on the subject, he agreed that the Senate should be less political in the sense of blindly following party lines, and that it would be preferable to have no senators attending the general caucuses, other than the leaders, their deputies and the whips. He also agreed with the point so often made that the representation of the opposition should be maintained at a considerably higher level than has been the case in recent years.

In May 1969, the Senate actually formed a special committee under Senator Lang to "investigate and report on the role of the Senate of Canada within the Canadian Constitution." In his remarks on the resolution, Senator Lang said:

I should like to review briefly with you, if I may, the references made to the Senate in the White Paper, and to the comments made by the Prime Minister at the last Federal-Provincial Conference. I do this at this time to underscore the very fundamental nature of the proposals being made.

First, the Prime Minister stated at the conference that both the federal government and all the provinces wished to retain the Senate.

And that is the same Prime Minister.

But perhaps the Senate might feel otherwise disposed. I think that is a matter which will not require much of the time of the proposed committee.

Senator Lang went on to say:

I would propose therefore that if this committee be constituted it should immediately attempt to obtain and express in so far as possible the general views of the Senate on these very specific matters:

- (a) Provincial and regional representation through direct appointment;
- (b) Redistribution of Senate membership;
- (c) Terms of appointment of senators;
- (d) Curtailment of the Senate's legislative power or suspensive veto; and
- (e) Assumption of responsibility for approval of judicial appointments, et cetera.

After Senator Martin left Senator Ray Perrault took over as leader, and in 1975 he set up a questionnaire which asked senators for their views on possible methods of reforming the Senate. So it can be seen that in almost every odd numbered year there has been thought and effort directed to bringing the Senate more into line with modern times.

Over nearly ten years, these matters were under as active consideration as they are today, the only difference, perhaps, being that previously there was no Bill C-60 with which, in some of its aspects, our committee and most of the provinces and the public seem to disagree. What is difficult to understand is why nothing has ever come of all these suggestions. Some have emanated from the caucuses, some from the government, some from the leaders in the Senate, and some from senators themselves—all good suggestions. Some have been around for years, and nothing has ever been done about them. I suggest that in continuing its work our committee should weigh very carefully all these matters about the form of the upper chamber.

The Senate has been severely criticized for the fact that its attendance is not what it should be. There have been other suggestions for improvement, but I do not think there have been any that would solve that problem. At the present time a senator can be absent from the Senate without losing his pay if he is ill and has a certificate to that effect, or if he is on public business. It is in these categories that much of the damage to our image has been done. At times there has been a lot of political activity which, while it might come under the definition of public business, is not, I believe, the prime role of the Senate. I would suggest—and to do this the Senate may have to seek amendments to the statutes—that a senator should be present for at least 50 per cent of all the sittings of the Senate over a period of two years, regardless of health or any other consideration. If his health is sufficiently bad, I believe—and I say this with real regret—he should retire and a means should be found to assure his pension. If a senator is absent for any other purpose, the normal deduction rules should apply.

I simply do not accept the fact that a member of this chamber can be absent for many months on end and still retain his or her position as a senator. A two-year period would take care of a major illness or any other serious situation, and still make it possible for the senator to average up his attendance in the second year. I think this would be completely fair and much better for the Senate.

Last Tuesday, Senator Forsey spoke in the debate and gave his views on the task of the Constitution Committee to examine and report on all the changes proposed. It was a splendid analysis, presented in his usual brilliant style and based on his encyclopedic knowledge. His act is hard to follow. Referring to the upper house, he dealt specifically with five issues, saying that he tended to favour a minimum number of opposition senators; consider some appointments of provincial nominees an improvement; doubt the wisdom of term appointments; look favourably on the suggestion of electing a Senate leader in addition to those of government and opposition, and listen to the merits of taking off the whips in the Senate.

I am repeating many of Senator Forsey's views and those of other senators, but I should like to record my own opinion. To sum up, I would, with respect, suggest that the committee examine the following questions:

First, should the distribution of Senate membership be changed? Should not the west have greater representation?

Second, would a retirement age of 70 be better than the present retirement age of 75?

Third, is there any acceptable reason for leaving the opposition so weak numerically? What should be the proportion?

Fourth, should some nominations for Senate appointments be made to the government by the provinces and, if so, to what extent?

Fifth, what should be the term of Senate appointments. There have been many suggestions, but I believe an appointment of from eight to ten years, with the possibility of one renewal, would probably be the best arrangement. This would be long enough for a senator to become thoroughly familiar with his duties, and it would cover the life of two Parliaments. It might be possible to reappoint a senator for one further term, but I suggest that a total period in the Senate of 18 to 20 years is long enough for anybody.

Sixth, what should be the extent of the Senate's power of suspensive veto? I suggest that the period of 60 days provided for in Bill C-60 is quite unreasonable, and that it should be at least six months. However, I tend to favour a nine-month suspensive veto based on the normal parliamentary session of recent years.

Seventh, what degree of attendance should be required of senators? I suggest, as I did earlier, that there be the obligation to attend at least half the sittings over a period of two years. If a senator finds that impossible, then he or she should resign.

I believe that the time has come for us to take, finally, definite and courageous action. I also believe that the members of this chamber have no need to prove their devotion to their country; they want only to be convinced of the proper course on which to set forth with resolution. Personally, I would not object to the abolition of the Senate if I could be convinced it was in the public good.

In conclusion, I would like to quote from Senator Roebuck's 1954 article, to which I previously referred:

A place in the Red Chamber is not only an honour, it's also a job, it's an employment, calling for studious industry, devotion to the public welfare, knowledge, thought and wisdom. Give us men and women who revere Canada and who love their fellowmen, who respect the individual and his rights, and would follow freedom wherever she may lead. Give us big men who are idealists and workers, who have courage and endurance, and the Senate will continue in ample measure its service to mankind.

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I should like to take just a few seconds to congratulate Senator Molson on his fine presentation today. While he will not have unanimous support, I am sure he has the sympathy of many of us with respect to many of his points.

On motion of Senator Lang, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, November 7, 1977:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to four recent reports on the Canadian textile industry.

He said: Honourable senators, I hope what I have to offer today will help to bring you up to date on the recent reports that have been made on the textile industry.

Miss Pestieau of the C. D. Howe Institute has done a recent study entitled "The Quebec Textile Industry in Canada." This study promotes an interesting theory. She suggests that the textile industry must be phased out, and that the federal and provincial governments should examine alternatives to the long-term protection of the textile industry. Miss Pestieau says her reasons for making those suggestions are, first, that there is no likelihood of a major part of the textile industry becoming internationally viable, in the sense of being able to survive without special import restraints; second, that there is little prospect that the textile and clothing industry will keep up the average level of production in Canadian manufacturing; and third, that inter-regional transfers have become major irritants in Confederation.

As a consequence, according to Miss Pestieau, a federal policy that would guarantee on a long-term basis special protection to the textile and clothing manufacturing industries in Quebec and Ontario would likely continue to cause friction. As a matter of fact, by adopting such a policy for Canada we would be following in the footsteps of Sweden, which enforced a similar policy a few years ago but which then had to reverse itself because of the immense damage that policy did to Sweden. Incidentally, the point of view expressed by Miss Pestieau in her report is factually correct, but it is not complete and looks to the future very negatively. It does not propose a positive and constructive policy of maintaining and strengthening this broadly-based Canadian industrial structure.

Her study even shows that the textile and clothing industries are modern, that they have made great strides in improving productivity and do not have the protection that traditional myths continue to suggest—certainly not the kind of protection enjoyed by major competitors in the industrialized world.

The labour force predictions used in her study are questionable, and are intended to imply that in six or seven years from now Canada will not be facing a significant unemployment problem. This, of course, remains to be seen.

If the textile and apparel industries are permitted to decline, it is estimated by the industry that unemployment could rise to between 8 per cent and 11 per cent in Ontario and, incredibly, to between 17 per cent to 21 per cent in Quebec. It would be a proposal for economic disaster.

In 1975 Canada imported textiles to the extent of—and these amounts are in U.S. dollars—$65.08 per capita, while the amount for the United States was $18.53; for Japan, $25.56; for France, $25.43; for FDR Germany, $58.30; and for the EEC countries, $37.90.

In 1975 Sweden had a policy of a complete "phasing out" of its textile industries. Since then, Sweden had to reverse its policy and reconstitute its textile industry and some of the other "phased out" industries. In 1975 Sweden imported textiles in the amount of $165.38 per capita.

Miss Pestieau's second recommendation to assure an orderly "phasing out" of textile and clothing activities requiring special protection from competing imports is the use of some form of "adjustment assistance." Federal policies tried out here in the past to help "phase out" textile industries have been injurious to Canadian employment, and destructive and ruinous for our national economy. They account for an important percentage of our unemployment. Their costs, direct and indirect, are a noticeable part of our national federal deficit.

I believe it would be untimely to underwrite the suggested forms of major assistance and forms of give-away support programs because their costs are prohibitive, they would not add to our economic growth, and would unavoidably meet with the same fate and the same misfortunes as the unfortunate "phasing out" attempts of Sweden, where such policies had to be reversed quickly because of their disastrous economic consequences. The "phasing out" of textiles as a long-term remedy for our textile problems would, from the outset, bring about disastrous consequences, and these at irrecoverable exorbitant costs. Besides, this would have to be accompanied by a costly planned "adjustment assistance" for textiles. It is an unnecessary costly gimmick destined to real failure, as happened in the Swedish experiment.

As we well know, we have been experiencing severe and costly unemployment problems that have resulted in good part from the general lowering of our tariffs on imported textiles, and recently we had no alternative but to impose protective quotas—recommended, as we know, by the Senate's Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee—some months ago to save the textile industry from complete elimination and considerable additional unemployment. The quotas brought better results. Because of them, the industry is now showing notable improvements in this part of our national economy because of this change of policy, and it has since given more employment to its labour force.

We now realize the immensity of the loss of federal government revenues because of the past importation of low cost textiles, which resulted in the loss of wages that would have been earned from the manufacture of textile products, and the high welfare and unemployment insurance costs that had to be paid instead. Because of the damage caused I, like many others, have lost confidence in free-trade planning in our economy. It was most costly, and brought disappointing results.

Personally, I believe this sort of planning is the cause of a good part of the economic mess we are in. Miss Pestieau admits in her report:

It may sound unrealistic at the present time even to suggest a policy reappraisal that entails not only hard political decisions but also a high level of transfer to Ontario and more especially to Quebec in the form of "Adjustment Assistance". Yet a policy of actively encouraging resources in uncompetitive textile and clothing production to relocate could be in the interest of all regions.

I disagree with these views. There are a number of major points that are being ignored here. There was no consideration of the grave and deep political implications it would bring. It is based on false premises. To me, it is very unrealistic, and it comes from unproductive reasoning. It is socially and economically irresponsible because, for one thing, it downgrades an important industry that provides some 25 per cent of the manufacturing employment in Quebec—some 12 per cent, if it is considered nationally. There is no analysis of the reasons why Sweden was forced to reverse its “phasing out” policy after trying it there disastrously for a few years. It should never become national policy to allow, as a result, the impoverishment of some regions in favour of other already prosperous areas of Canada. It is a political and economic error in judgment.

We should not be expected to bring about the betterment of the economy of certain industries in certain sectors of Canada by sacrificing and impoverishing the textile industry situated in other sectors. There never was, and is not now, a rationale of economic justification for such economic behaviour on our part.

Moreover, it would not be acceptable government moral comportment to adhere to “phasing out” theories. There has already been enough of this kind of thinking in the GATT negotiations and agreements with Canada, resulting in costly arrangements that became liabilities and caused deficits for Canada when everything was taken into account. Many other countries involved in similar trade arrangements have also been hurt by them. Our own national economy has now been weakened by them, whatever the original purpose was. It is time to realize that this kind of partnership in international trade must be reanalyzed, reassessed and revalued. Given Canada’s economic shape, we cannot overlook what has been happening lately.

The recommendations of the National Textile Task Force recognize this, and these recommendations must now be accepted and taken into consideration in government policies for the betterment of the economy. This task force report is in direct opposition to, and in total conflict with, the views, the philosophy, the reasoning and, of course, the C. D. Howe Institute’s “phasing out” theories, and against the free trade views of the Economic Council which have reflected so adversely and harmfully on our national economy.

The report of the Consultative Federal Textile Force was unanimous, and it made constructive recommendations. It did not conclude negatively that there should be any “phase out.” On the contrary, it made recommendations to assist the textile and apparel industries in making their best possible contribution to the Canadian economy. The actions proposed were said to be essential if the textile industry is “to survive as a vigorous contributor to Canada’s economic health and future and if the dramatic decline which has been taking place during the past decade is to be reversed.”

Essentially, these recommendations were tailored to increase the textile industry’s productivity through its own means. The task force also stressed the view that “a Canadian national trade policy more defensive than the one in place now here or in the United States or in the European Community” is necessary in Canada if there is to be an investment flow into high productivity and efficient and competitive textile and apparel processes. This federal textile task force has given its recommendations by making them “basic with a rededication by government to the achievement of a more favourable investment climate for Canadian manufacturing industry in general.” It will be remembered that this sector employs 20 per cent of the manufacturing labour force in Canada.

The report points out that if a 15 per cent increase in production by the textile and apparel industries were to flow from the recommendations, the astonishing results would be some 140,000 new jobs, $750 million in new wages per year in our textile industry and related sectors, $927 million in added household incomes, $681 million in additional consumer spending, and $1.56 billion annually in new industrial output. These figures are set out in Table 3 on page 23 of the report. Such an increase in production would increase government revenues at all levels by $414 million annually.

It is worthy of note that this would not require the expenditure of $4 billion by the government as advocated by the Economic Council and the C.D. Howe Institute free traders. It would result merely from a government policy move based on the recommendations of its task force, and at very small cost.

Just think of the different impact the two approaches would have on our economic future, long or short term. One would assure a better national economy and many more jobs at no significant cost, while the recommendations of the Economic Council and the C.D. Howe Institute would provide a replacement for a textile industry “phased out” at a federal minimum cost of $4 billion—and this without providing any additional industries or jobs, and thereby creating widespread economic instability and a constant drain of Canadian dollars.

It is now highly desirable that the levels of consultation between the government, the industrialists, the labour unions and the retail trade, as represented by the Canadian Retail Council and the Retail Merchants Association of Canada, be improved. The government, it seems, has finally recognized this. I strongly commend the initiative and the judgment of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the formation of some 23 important industrial federal task forces to help design new industrial strategies for Canada.

The recommendations of the Textile and Clothing Industries Task Force are grouped in five parts. There are five principal recommendations, and they are worth citing here: first, government consultation; second, productivity of the industry and how it can be improved; third, searches for incentives or grants programs which can really assist in meeting this objective; fourth, broad fiscal measures which lay the foundations for a healthy industry—the report discusses the textile industry “under attack from countries with structures significantly different from our own which cannot let us hope to survive without special measures of protections"—and fifth, the elements of a Canadian trade policy which will create the necessary climate for continued long-term investment viability.

The report also recommends that the Textile and Clothing Advisory Panel that was formed in 1976 under the Honourable Donald Jamieson, when he was Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, continue in existence to advise the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on the implementations of the recommendations contained in the report and any other matters related to the role of these industries in the Canadian economy. This most significant forward and constructive step on the reform of our economic and industrial policies should be endorsed and further developed. At least it is a step in the right direction.

The report of the Economic Council and its recommendations, and even its predictions, have been, in my judgment, too often erroneous or misleading these last few years. Because of this, I, and many others like me, presently attach less value to what it recommends or predicts.

The Economic Council, like the C. D. Howe Institute, is, in this respect, in direct conflict not only with the recommendations of the federal textile task force, but with another recent serious and important study made in England, a country which has had a history of similar textile industry problems resulting from the policy of free trade by which its promoters were trying to achieve the elimination of the textile industry in order to facilitate and promote the exportation of certain other British-made products. It failed, and this British report points to the fallacy of the theories of the Economic Council and the C. D. Howe Institute, and to the total failure of the textile "phasing out" policy in Britain.

[Translation]

By opposition to the reports of the C. D. Howe Institute and the policy of the Economic Council of Canada, I would like to mention the statement made in Sherbrooke on July 12, 1978 by the Honourable Bernard Landry, the Quebec Minister of State for Economic Development, who does not believe that the Quebec textile industry should be allowed to disappear at the present time when unemployment has reached the level of 10 per cent or 11 per cent in this province.

Quebec cannot afford such irresponsibility and it cannot take the risk of adding the 100,000 employees of the textile and clothing industry in Quebec to those already unemployed. The minister stated, and I quote:

It is important for an economy to maintain its traditional sectors so that the country will not be at the mercy of imports.

He mentioned the experience in Sweden, which, after it had eliminated its traditional industries, had to come back to them later on. The Quebec minister also guaranteed to his Sherbrooke audience that, for its part, the provincial government would protect the more traditional sectors of its economy. He commented on the recent conclusions of the federal task force on textile and clothing by saying that it was possible to increase the production of the Canadian textile industry as well as direct and indirect employment. The Quebec Minister of State for Economic Development also repeated that the wishes of his government in this matter are quite clear since it has asked the Quebec Corporation for Industrial Development to develop a program of positive assistance for the textile industry.

This is in complete disagreement with the theory of certain free trade supporters in the Economic Council of Canada and the C.D. Howe Institute who suggest that we should eliminate as soon as possible the soft sector of textile industries by an injection of approximately $4 billion and probably more by the federal government so as to obtain results which would barely compensate the elimination of the textile industry. In their opinion, the unproductive spending of such an amount is neither important nor consequential. For our part, we believe that such an irresponsible decision would have serious consequences, especially in Quebec, whose more than 100,000 textile workers produce 60 per cent of all Canadian textiles and would now have to be retrained according to this theory so as to attain the great dream of free traders, whatever the economic or social consequences for the workers in the areas where this industry is established.

For over 25 years we have witnessed the total failure of such economic experiments and have been subjected, to our economic disadvantage, to a real type of international blackmail in commercial trading while our textile workers have been subjected to the massive indignity of unemployment because of these disastrous theories. As a matter of fact, we should be well aware that our Quebec workers will not move elsewhere that easily. Past experience should be proof to this. Nobody wishes to go through the forced emigrations that marked the beginning of this century. Unfortunately our economic theoreticians are not concerned with the kind of problems they initiate and develop in our areas where the Canadian textile industry is concentrated, with sad and disastrous consequences. They make no assessment of any kind of the prohibitive cost of those disruptive measures they want to set up, without any value or addition to our economy.

Those types of backward measures are now suggested by the Economic Council's free traders, and Miss Pestieau from the C.D. Howe Institute. They fly in the face of recommendations by the federal task force made up of the best experts and the best specialists in the area of textiles. They fly in the face of the recent British report on textiles. They fly in the face of Sweden's disastrous experience, where the systematic elimination of the textile industry was put to trial. This is the type of measure that leads to costly and useless destruction of valuable industries, and it is therefore unacceptable.

It is sheer irresponsibility in my view and simple mismanagement of the economy to refer to a $4 billion fund to facilitate the dismantling of that industry—textiles—and the redeployment of resources. It is ignoring both the cost and the economic and social implications, for the purpose of testing the forced elimination theories that failed in other countries. That inevitably will mean unemployment for many Canadians. That will cost a minimum of $4 billion to our Canadian taxpayers without adding anything to an already weakened economy. That has no measure of productive input to help the economy's progress.

The relinquishing of domestic markets by our Canadian textile producers would have but very short-term benefits for certain segments of the economy. If textile production were to disappear in Canada, why should textile imports be sold cheaply when we know the Canadian consumer is used to paying more and there would no longer be any domestic products? Such was the experience in Sweden, where the people finally paid the highest price in the world for their imported textiles.

Common sense and the experience gained elsewhere require a more serious and deeper examination of the textile industry. Indeed, the federal government had no concern about it until some decades ago, and even then to no other extent than band-aid measures. Hopefully, the current study by the federal task force on textile and clothing will help them show better judgment on the right approach to enlightened economic progress in the textile area.

I submit it is important now that the federal government more closely supervise the offhand appeasements that were sometimes accepted by our Canadian negotiating team at the GATT talks.

The industries of fine papers, textiles, gloves and footwear in Quebec still bears the burden of disadvantageous agreements signed twelve years ago. We tried to destroy systematically the textile industry in Quebec to stimulate exports originating from other sectors which, as we now recognize, did not work very well.

I think that henceforth it would be more constructive and more advantageous in the short and in the long term to entirely exclude textiles, gloves, footwear and some other industries from GATT agreements and to follow the more practical and articulate recommendations from the reports of federal task forces to ensure the success, the development and the expansion of those industries. Besides, they are certainly more concerned about our real interest, the real interest of Canada.

The interest of Canada does not lie in the implementation of misguided theories that have failed in countries where they have been tried. Our economic interests rather lie in every respect in the pursuit of proven and economic principles that will restore everyone's confidence and ensure a sound economic development that will guarantee our real prosperity.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Daudlin had been substituted for that of Mr. Dawson on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Langlois tabled:

Report on operations of the Office of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76.

FUGITIVE OFFENDERS BILL

FIRST READING

Senator Langlois presented Bill S-9, respecting fugitive offenders in Canada.

Bill read first time.

Senator Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday next, November 20.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, November 20, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before Her Honour the Speaker puts the question on my motion I shall give you a brief rundown of next week's business in the Senate.

First, the committees. The Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution will meet at 10.30 a.m. on Tuesday, and I believe it is the intention to ask permission of the Senate to sit again at 2.00 p.m. on that day. Also on Tuesday, meetings have been set down for the Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies for 2.00 p.m., and the National Finance Committee on the DREE estimates at 2.30 p.m. Permission for the latter two meetings will also have to be obtained if the Senate sits on Tuesday afternoon, which is unlikely.

On Wednesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. and 2.30 p.m. to hear witnesses on the subject matter of Bill C-15, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1978.

On Thursday the Retirement Age Policy Committee meets at 9.00 a.m.; the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will hear further witnesses on the subject matter of Bill C-15 at 9.30 a.m.; the National Finance Committee will continue its examination of the DREE estimates at 9.30 a.m.; Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will hold a meeting at 11.00 a.m.; and the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline will meet when the Senate rises.

In the Senate we shall continue with the bills already on the order paper and with Bill S-9, which was introduced a few moments ago. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee reports on Bills S-4 and S-5 will be presented on Monday evening, and on Tuesday evening the National Finance Committee will report on the supplementary estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1979.

My information is that Bill C-5, to amend the Old Age Security Act, and Bill C-7, respecting borrowing authority, should pass in the other place today. So it is therefore suggested that we sit Monday evening instead of tomorrow as mentioned in my statement last week.

Senator Hicks: I am not sure of the acting leader's statement. Was it that the Senate will sit Tuesday evening?

Senator Langlois: It is the intention to sit in the evening.

Senator Hicks: As well as the afternoon?

Senator Langlois: No. We have too many committees sitting in the afternoon.

Senator Flynn: The acting leader indicated that we are to sit on Monday evening, but he was not specific as to why we should sit on Monday evening instead of Tuesday evening.

I understand there is some urgency with regard to Bill C-7, which may pass today or tomorrow in the other place. However, I am not too certain as to what difference it would make if we were to sit on Tuesday, as we normally do, since Bill C-7 provides that "this act shall come into force or be deemed to have come into force on November 1, 1978." For that reason I do not see what difference it makes whether it passes and receives royal assent on Thursday next rather than on Wednesday or even Tuesday.

It would be useful to members of the Senate to find out the reasoning behind this Monday urgency for a bill that comes into force retroactively on November 1, 1978.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I have had occasion to discuss this proposed Monday sitting with the Leader of the Opposition. This retroactive provision will not exist until the bill is passed, of course. I do not think it would be prudent for any Minister of Finance in the future to go ahead and use the additional borrowing authority sought, because if the government were defeated in the house and an election was called earlier than expected, the retroactivity would not exist. I do not think it would be prudent for any Minister of Finance to act on the assumption that the bill will pass with this retroactive provision in it.

● (1410)

That is not the only reason why we are sitting next Monday. We also have a heavy schedule of work for next week. The legislative program is heavy enough, and the committee workload is also heavy, so I think we will need all the days next week at our disposal, starting Monday until Thursday, to dispose, to a reasonable degree, of this very heavy workload.

Senator Flynn: I must say that the explanation given by the acting leader is far from convincing. This argument of the government being defeated in the house is rather hypothetical in the circumstances.

Senator Langlois: It is not an argument. It is a question of prudence.

Senator Flynn: I have heard about the imminence of an election before, and it was more convincing when I heard it in April of this year than it is this afternoon. Would the acting leader say that he wants to proceed with second reading of Bill C-7 on Monday?

Senator Langlois: If I have leave to proceed I will proceed, but I am in the hands of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: If you say, "I only wish you to be here on Monday,"—and just believe me, I think it is better—I will accept that. But just say it, will you?

Senator Grosart: Say it.

Senator Langlois: Unfortunately, as I have already said, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition agreed to sitting on Monday, but he has apparently changed his mind since.

Senator Flynn: No, no. I am still agreeing, but I want you to give a very simple reason. If you have no reason, that is different.

Senator Langlois: I know my honourable friend is just trying to have a good time this afternoon. I listened to his argument, which was not too convincing. I repeat, it would not be prudent for a Minister of Finance to rely on the eventual passage of a bill containing a retroactive provision. The bill can come to us with the retroactive provision and could be turned down by this house.

Senator Flynn: By this house?

Senator Langlois: Yes. It would be most imprudent to act on the assumption that because there is a retroactive provision in the bill, the government would simply go ahead and exercise this borrowing authority in advance of the bill's passage.

Senator Flynn: Why don't we sit on Sunday?

Senator Langlois: We can sit tomorrow if you wish. My original proposal in this respect was to sit tomorrow and Monday. In an effort to accommodate honourable senators it was decided to sit on Monday evening instead.

I might say again that I did discuss this matter with the Leader of the Opposition. I do not think he has any great objection to it. It seems to me he is merely having a little fun this afternoon, and it has been very amusing.

Senator Flynn: We will find out on Monday.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might address a question to the Acting Leader of the Government in respect of Bill C-7. I am wondering why it is necessary that the bill be passed on Wednesday rather than Thursday. Is there anything the acting leader can tell us in respect of the urgency of this matter?

Senator Langlois: The urgency rests in the fact that the government is running short of borrowing authority.

Senator Roblin: Has it run out?

Senator Langlois: Not yet, but it is certainly close to the maximum allowed under the present borrowing authority. As I said in responding to the Leader of the Opposition, it would not be prudent to act on the assumption that Parliament would agree to pass the bill as introduced; that is, with this retroactive provision in it. For that reason, all possible steps should be taken to ensure its earliest possible passage. It is a question of prudence. We are dealing with the financing of the government's expenditures. It is an important measure and one which should be dealt with as soon as possible.

The Senate rarely sits Monday evenings, and certainly it is only reasonable to expect that honourable senators would agree to hold a Monday evening sitting when there is an important measure to be considered.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am quite prepared to follow the suggestion of my honourable friend. However, what I am trying to determine is whether there will be any time constraints on the debate of this measure. In other words, is there some technical reason necessitating its passage next week or some technicality that would limit the time for debate on the bill?

Senator Langlois: Once the bill is before us, we can take whatever time the Senate deems necessary to debate it. It is my intention—and I have already mentioned this to the Leader of the Opposition—to move, at the conclusion of the debate on the motion for second reading, that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole, at which point the Minister of Finance can explain the reasons behind the measure. Once that has taken place, honourable senators will be in a position to form their own judgment as to the urgency of the measure.

Motion agreed to.

SHIPPING

DATE OF CLOSING OF ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—QUESTION

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question is prompted by the demands of western grain producers that the St. Lawrence Seaway be kept open as long as possible.

The intention now is to close the Seaway on December 15. We know that 30 or 40 American ships will be operating in the Seaway beyond December 15, and we know that certain oil tankers will be operating in the Seaway beyond December 15.

In light of that, I am wondering whether any further consideration is being given to extending the season beyond December 15, particularly for the purpose of moving grain.

I am wondering, too, whether it has been brought to his attention that the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority recently received a report that it commissioned some time ago on the length of the season's operation. This report was commissioned from the firm of LBA Consulting Partners Limited of Ottawa.

I would ask the acting leader to do everything he can to see that that report is made available to the house. It may be that, having seen the report, honourable senators will want to debate it.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I want to first of all thank Senator Argue for providing me with written notice of at least part of his question relating to the navigation season on the St. Lawrence Seaway. In response to this part of the question, Transport Canada, as in the past, is going to do its very best to keep the Seaway open as long as possible. It is hard to establish how long this could be carried out because it depends on adverse weather and ice conditions in the Seaway area.

● (1420)

When the honourable senator sent the notice this morning of his intention to ask this question, he attached to it a photocopy of a report published in the Globe and Mail this morning. I think that the honourable senator will find a partial answer to his question in this article, from which I quote the following paragraph:

A. M. Luce, senior adviser to St. Lawrence Seaway Authority president Paul Normandeau, confirmed that the $59,000 study had been completed by LBA Consulting Partners Ltd. of Ottawa. But it would take several weeks to review the document and publish it in final form—

I am informed that as long as this report has not been finalized, it will not be published, but as soon as this is completed, publication will be made.

The honourable senator asked me this morning if there would be an opportunity to debate this report in this house. Well, any honourable senator can originate an inquiry, and so the honourable senator can originate a debate on this matter at any time he wishes. There will be no objection. In addition to that I am informed that if the Minister of Transport tables a report in the other place, it will automatically be tabled here at the same time.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I want to thank the acting leader for his statement, and particularly for that part in which he gave us hope that the Seaway would be kept open beyond December 15, provided that weather conditions make this possible. Our earlier information was that they were abiding by the closing date of December 15, and it is most encouraging when he holds out hope that, weather permitting, the Seaway will be kept open for grain shipments beyond that date.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, with reference to that report about which Senator Argue inquired, and in respect of which the acting leader replied, may I ask if it includes a study of the effect upon the Atlantic ports of keeping the Seaway open for longer periods than now is the case?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, since this report has not been completed and has not been published, I am unable to answer that question. We will have to wait until the report is made public before we can see what effect a later closing of the Seaway could have on the Atlantic coast ports.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, if the Seaway should be closed by ice conditions, before December 15, is it the intention to put icebreakers in to keep it open? If so, will this be done to the detriment of the Atlantic coast ports, and the work force in that area?

Senator Langlois: I think this is a question which has been asked before. I do not see that there could be any detriment to Atlantic coast ports by keeping the Seaway open for a week or so longer than was seen possible. It is difficult, in a country as large as ours to please everybody at the same time, but I cannot see how the Seaway could be kept open without causing some degree of difficulty for ports, particularly on the Atlantic coast and perhaps even Montreal.

Having these problems in mind, this country decided to build a Seaway many years ago. This vast project was carried out with the consent of the country as a whole.

Senator Argue: I wonder if I may be permitted to make a statement along the lines of Senator Riley's inquiry? I see no reason why keeping the Seaway open for grain, particularly this year, should in any way affect the port of Saint John or any other eastern seaboard port because there is sufficient business on hand and sufficient sales have been made to keep both facilities operating—the railroads going down to the eastern ports, and the Seaway. I believe that kind of a suggestion does not apply in this case.

Senator Flynn: I would suggest the honourable senator is out of order. He could give notice that he intends to debate the whole matter.

Senator Argue: I thought you might be interested in having some information.

Senator Flynn: Not information that everybody has.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, in relation to this matter I am, of course, in agreement with the Acting Leader of the Government that this is a large country with many varying interests, and it is difficult to do something helpful to one area without the risk of affecting another. However, I would like to have the assurance that, when the Government of Canada takes into consideration the matter of keeping the Seaway open substantially longer than in the past, it also takes into consideration the probable effect upon the Atlantic ports.

Senator Langlois: This question, honourable senators, touches on the forthcoming report on the possible extension of navigation on the Seaway. The question posed by the honourable senator from Colchester shows that a debate on this important subject would be quite appropriate in this chamber when the report is before us, and we have all the information to discuss and debate same.

I am pleased to note that my honourable colleague agrees with me that in a vast country like Canada it is hard to do something that does not affect neighbouring provinces or regions with similar interests. For example, I know that the economy of the Atlantic coast is linked to navigation, as is part of the province of Quebec and even the Great Lakes, for that matter. If we do anything for one area, it might affect the others. It is an unavoidable consequence. We shall have to live with this so long as we live in a united Canada.

AGRICULTURE

FEED GRAIN PRICES—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue, primarily because he is the only member of the cabinet here. It is in respect to the severely depressed feed grain prices in western Canada. The income for farmers in the prairies region who rely on feed grains such as oats, barley, and feed wheat has been practically zero since the new crop year started.

I would ask Senator Guay to contact the minister responsible for the Wheat Board and make representations that would lead to export sales and use of the delivery system in relation to these feed grains. This would have the effect of selling some of this grain on the export market as well as removing the pressure that is causing depressed prices within the domestic market in Canada.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, the question is a very easy one. It is to make certain representations to the minister responsible for grains, and I will be glad to do that immediately upon leaving the Senate chamber today.

Senator Olson: After the minister has made those representations, would he report to this house? Any announcement of any improvement in this situation will have an immediate effect of raising prices in the prairies, particularly in connection with offboard sales.

Senator Guay: I shall be pleased to do that.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SAFETY OF CANADIAN WORKERS IN IRAN—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Would the Acting Leader of the Government extract from the Department of External Affairs the position with regard to the upheaval in Iran as it relates to the safety of and danger to Canadians, particularly those people from Newfoundland who recently went to Iran to work in the pulp and paper industry?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I shall be very pleased to do so, and I shall take the question as notice.

LABOUR

NUMBER OF STRIKES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I should like to reply to a question posed to me on Tuesday evening by Senator Walker. I shall not read the introduction to his question because it contains a few laudatory remarks about your humble servant.

Senator Asselin: Senator Walker is not here today. Could you not postpone your remarks until next week?

Senator Langlois: I am answering a question. The substance of the question is as follows:

Since Canada has the largest number of strikes per capita per year of any industrialized country in the world, would the Honourable the Leader of the Government outline what steps, if any, the government proposes to take to reduce the number of strikes?

The reply is a lengthy one. To my mind it is an interesting answer, and I hope that honourable senators will bear with me if I read it.

The incidence of strikes in Canada, in relation to other countries, has been a subject of considerable confusion in recent years. Many have claimed that Canada's strike record is the worst of any industrialized country, and do so purely on the basis of conveniently selected statistics, without questioning the differences in statistical methods or the different industrial relations systems within which management/labour differences are recorded. However, if we briefly consider the factors behind the statistics, Canada's strike record will be seen to be much more favourable than suggested by the premise of Senator Walker's question.

First, some countries exclude strikes of a political nature in reporting on the incidence of strike activity. Canada is not one of those countries, although it has a greater degree of political stability than many European countries included in international comparisons of strike activity. A further difference is that the Canadian figures include virtually all strikes, including those of even one day's duration. In contrast, many countries exclude from their figures disputes below a minimum number of working days lost and/or workers involved. Not only are statistics per se an approximation of reality but, moreover, these differences alone suggest that comparisons can be distorted.

Second, Canada's industrial relations system varies significantly from many countries with which it is compared. Collective bargaining in Canada takes place on a fragmented basis at the enterprise or plant level. In many industrialized nations, bargaining takes place to a greater extent on an industry or sectoral level; that is, they are characterized by a highly centralized bargaining structure, and in other countries with a similarly fragmented bargaining system, radically different industrial structures and mechanisms may prevail, such as compulsory arbitration in Australia. When we consider that Australia, with half the number of wage and salary earners as Canada, experiences more than three times the number of work stoppages involving four to six times as many workers, it is clear that Canada's strike activity is more favourable than some would like us to believe.

When we examine the evidence, in an international comparison of the number of strikes in relation to paid workers, Canada's position has been about seventh since 1970; that is, worker involvement industrial disputes is less acute than in many other major industrialized countries. Furthermore, the decline in the percentage of estimated working time lost due to strikes from .4 per cent in 1972 to less than .2 per cent in 1977 indicates both a small magnitude of productive time lost due to strikes in Canada, as well as the fact that there has been an overall improvement in our strike record.

A further ingredient of Canada's industrial relations system, which contrasts with many countries, is that industrial relations in Canada is governed by many jurisdictions; namely, by each of the provinces and the federal government, which has responsibility for interprovincial commerce and works deemed to be for the benefit of all Canadians. When this distinction of jurisdictions is made, it is interesting to note that since 1969 the percentage of estimated working time lost due to strikes in the federal private sector in seven of those nine years has been better than the percentage for the total economy.

It should be noted that the process and strategy for dealing with strikes in the federal private sector are not static. The dispute resolution techniques of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service of the Canada Department of Labour, which has responsibility for Part V of the Canada Labour Code, are periodically modified to take account of changing pressures and needs arising from the labour/management interrelationship, and new techniques are introduced after careful experimentation. There has been, for example, a large emphasis on mediation in the past 10 years, and a move away from the use of conciliation boards. These and other measures have enabled the FMCS to achieve settlements, without a work stoppage, in some 90 per cent of all cases referred to it throughout the period since 1949. That this remarkable record has been maintained in the face of a greatly expanded caseload is a measure of the effectiveness of the government's ability to meet its industrial relations responsibilities.

It should also be recalled that in the previous session of Parliament, certain amendments to the Canada Labour Code were passed. Those amendments were designed to reinforce the collective bargaining system and to ensure that our labour relations laws and procedures can continue to respond to its changing and complex needs.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, as a supplementary question, may I ask the Acting Leader of the Government if he will provide the chamber with the latest comparative figures of the OECD and the International Labour Office—the figures and no verbiage?

Senator Langlois: I am ready to take the supplementary question as notice, even though it is supplementary to the reply and not to the question that was originally posed.

Senator Grosart: It was supplementary to the original question.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX REBATE—ANSWER

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I would like to answer the question raised yesterday afternoon by Senator Flynn concerning the Tax Rebate Discounting Act and the possible amendments which might be moved following the criticism honourable senators made before it was passed.

You certainly know that the administration of this act, although it is related to the Income Tax Act, is not under my authority but under the authority of my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. You will also recall that this legislation came into force virtually at the end of the peak period for the 1977 income tax returns, as mentioned yesterday.

This morning, I discussed personally with my colleague, the Honourable Warren Allmand, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the possibility of amending the bill, Bill C-46, and he indicated that changes are now being considered and they will be put forward in the near future, among other amendments, in a new bill. As I already mentioned, I have every reason to believe that it will be in the near future.

Senator Flynn: I thank the minister and I note with interest that he is prepared to answer questions relating not only to his department but also virtually any department.

PRIVATE BILL

J. H. POITRAS & SON LTD.—SECOND READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill S-8, to revive J. H. Poitras & Son Ltd.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to revive the company known as J. H. Poitras & Son Ltd. This company, which has its principal place of business in the city of Hull, Quebec, was incorporated in 1965, and since that time has been selling, servicing and installing fire protection equipment, such as fire extinguishers, as well as fire and burglar alarm systems in the Ottawa and Hull areas.

In September 1977, the owner of the company decided to sell his shares to another company. In the course of completing the documentation arising out of that sale it was discovered by the petitioner's lawyer—and he was so advised by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in response to a request for information—that the company had been dissolved in 1968 for failure to file with the department, for three consecutive years, the annual information returns required under the Canada Corporations Act.

Senator Grosart: He must have had a good lawyer!

Senator McIlraith: In any event, I am advised that when he checked further, it was discovered that the notices that were alleged to have been sent out requesting the filing of returns did not come to the attention of the company. They were not sent to the company's own address, so the company did not have knowledge of them.

The notices, of course, were also published in the Canada Gazette. The notices were apparently not read by the company either, which is perhaps understandable.

Senator Flynn: It is not a very popular publication.

Senator McIlraith: In any case, the returns were not filed and the company was dissolved before the new owner acquired shares in it.

Neither the petitioner nor the original owner of the company was aware of its dissolution and the business of the company was carried on, despite the fact that unknown to them it had been dissolved as a corporate body.

In the circumstances, the petition is asking that the company be revived, and that it be deemed not to have been dissolved, in order to regularize the situation.

This being a private bill, it is a matter, of course, of the appropriate Senate committee examining the allegations of fact, and, if it is satisfied that the facts are as alleged, taking the necessary action.

I would propose, if and when second reading is granted, to ask that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for examination of the allegations.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder if I might ask the sponsor of the bill what is the probability of a loss being sustained by the purchaser of these shares? What difference does it make to him, in terms of dollars, whether the company is in existence or not?

Senator McIlraith: Well, a very great loss would be involved. I do not want to presume to put the detailed figures on the record on second reading. I think that is something for the committee to look into. However, it is obvious that the company had been paying income tax on the assumption that there was a company, and those tax returns have now all to be opened up and payment made on the assumption that it was a personal ownership. In the light of that, you can see that there would be a very great financial significance.

I am sorry for not being more exact in reducing that mathematical exercise to precise figures, but it is just not possible at this stage.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SIXTY-FIFTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, BONN, WEST GERMANY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, November 8, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Bonnell calling the attention of the Senate to the Sixty-fifth Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Bonn, West Germany, 5th to 13th September, 1978, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, Senator Bonnell, who was a member of the delegation to the Bonn Conference, has explained very clearly its structure. He also expressed our appreciation to all those who helped to make it a successful conference. I simply want to add my own thanks to our staff and the contingent who accompanied us on the trip, to the Canadian ambassador at Bonn and his staff, to the staff at External Affairs here who briefed us prior to our departure, and also, obviously, to our host, the Federal Republic of Germany and the staff put at our disposal, in particular, Miss Ute Gehre and Mr. Gunter Hamann, who were so extremely helpful and such pleasant people to deal with.

I am quite aware, from previous experience here in the Senate, that when we report on one of these trips it is considered by many to be a travelogue. I sincerely hope that neither Senator Bonnell's contribution nor my own will be in that category. I readily admit that travelling is enjoyable, and seeing new countries is a pleasant experience. The host countries receive us very well, and it is undoubtedly useful for parliamentarians to see other parts of the world and meet other parliamentarians. It is not my purpose, however, to go through those details today. Instead, I would like to focus on the purposes of the IPU, and, I trust, some of the results that the IPU has been able to achieve.

It is important, as well, for us to consider how Canadian parliamentarians can make an ever-better contribution to the parliamentary groups to which they belong. We have a golden opportunity there always to do a better job, and we should be looking at the ways and means whereby we can do it.

● (1450)

At the outset, I must say that I returned from the Bonn conference with a much better appreciation of the purposes, the role and the possibilities of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. Once before in the Senate, when I reported on another Inter-Parliamentary Union conference held elsewhere, I questioned the direction that I thought the IPU was taking and the validity of our participation in that type of body. At that time, I was concerned about the IPU's becoming, in my view at least, more and more a propaganda forum than a genuine forum for the discussion of world problems. It seemed to me at that time that it was bogged down in a perpetual and repetitive discussion over the Middle East situation. It did not seem to matter that the subject under discussion was education, natural resources or something else, the two sides always seemed able to bring in the Middle East question.

This time—in large part because of the Camp David discussions which were going on at the very time we were meeting in Bonn—both sides agreed that they should not interfere with that very worthwhile endeavour to bring peace to the Middle East, and they refrained from doing it.

Previously, the North and South Korea situation had the same potential, and at one stage it reached almost the same level. I suppose now we could be facing the same problem with the Sahara question.

At the Bonn conference that did not happen, and I am pleased that we are moving forward with better understanding. I am not suggesting that all of it has been erased. We have to keep on pushing for a genuine discussion. It is not always easy, and I am still concerned about what I sense to be bloc voting on the part of the communist bloc countries. I would prefer to see much more genuine independence on the part of delegates who attend the conference. It may be wishful thinking, but possibly by continuing discussion and by example we can arrive at more understanding in that regard.

Senator Bonnell gave a very good description of the various items that were under discussion at Bonn, and I do not propose to go over those topics except for one—the disarmament question. Both Senator Bonnell and I were directly involved in this. I participated in the general debate, and I am pleased to say that the tenor of the discussion was very positive. There was general support for the proposals coming out of the special session of the United Nations. There was obviously some discussion on the question of the neutron bomb and the SS-20 missile. Both sides took fixed positions on that, but it was finally resolved by their agreeing to a wording which eliminated both those terms and simply used a general phrase on which they could arrive at a conclusion which, if it was not unanimously agreed to, was at least one that received substantial support. The final resolution passed the General Assembly by a vote of 603 in favour and 35 against, with 163 abstentions.

As I said, it was in keeping with the United Nations proposal and it was one that Canada could support. Both Senator Bonnell and I sat on the drafting committee, and we made a particular proposal when there was a move by some of the communist countries to remove a provision calling for publication of the transfer of arms and actual figures of arms production. There was a move by the communist countries to prevent public disclosure. It was our view that if you cannot start by having an open statement on what the arms are, then discussion on limiting them is purely academic. Our point of view carried the day.

Another specific proposal we made in the course of the disarmament debate was with respect to our continuing concern as a country producing nuclear equipment—not war material but equipment for peaceful uses—and a country with great productive capacity and scientific knowledge, about the peaceful use of this equipment. We were further concerned about the disposal of radio-active waste. We suggested that the IPU might well consider this a subject for further study as a world problem.

I shall turn now to subjects not really or directly part of the general conference discussions, but which were very much part of the IPU's work and were discussed by the Inter-Parliamentary Council which met at the same time as the General Assembly. On the Inter-Parliamentary Council we have two Canadian representatives: Mr. Lloyd Francis, M.P., Chairman of the Canadian group, and Mr. David MacDonald, M.P. These two members were very active in these particular areas. Again, I will not cover all of the subjects discussed by the council, but I want to touch on some in which Canadians have a particular interest or involvement.

I refer first to the International Conference of Parliamentarians on Population and Development. This conference is scheduled to take place in Colombo from August 28 to 31, 1979. This group has as its secretary-general a Canadian parliamentarian, Dr. Frank Philbrook, so we have a direct involvement in the conference. The question of population is of direct concern to us. While we are not one of those countries contributing to the population explosion, we certainly have a direct concern in the whole problem and, obviously, as one of the great food-producing countries, we must have an involvement.

The proposal here was that the IPU be involved in this conference, which was originally sponsored by the United Nations, and it was agreed that the IPU would co-sponsor it and would be directly involved. I am very pleased that that action has been taken.

Another specific area the council dealt with was the question of parliamentarians and the United Nations. There has been a growing concern that parliamentarians are not sufficiently involved in the work of the United Nations. This is somewhat akin to the problem we sometimes feel in Canada that governments, as distinct from parliamentarians, may be dealing with things. The constitutional question is a possible example. There may be conferences between leaders of governments, discussions between government members and members of cabinet at different levels, but parliamentarians are not always in the process. As we all recall, there was a joint committee some years ago on the Constitution, and now we have a Special Senate Committee on the Constitution. This is really the involvement of parliamentarians as distinct from conferences of first ministers.

The same concern exists in the United Nations. In this regard again Canadians have had a direct involvement, and Mr. David MacDonald, M.P. took a particular position on this at the council meeting and put forward some very useful suggestions. As a result, the council has agreed to explore more fully a closer involvement of parliamentarians with the work of the United Nations. In this way there will be more information flowing to parliamentarians, and more involvement of parliamentarians, so that we will not encounter a situation in which the United Nations becomes more and more a body of government and non-government institutions that are not directly representative of the people as parliamentarians are.

The last specific subject I want to mention is that of human rights. This is a subject which has been receiving more public discussion recently. There is more and more talk about it. The President of the United States has certainly become personally involved in this question. Canadians, to their credit, have been involved in it for a long time through the IPU. The previous Chairman of the Canadian group, Mr. Gordon Fairweather, who is now the Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, was very much involved in the whole field of human rights.

This has been followed through, and I am pleased to say that a member of the Senate has taken an active part relating to human rights in previous IPU conferences. I refer to our colleague, the Honourable Senator Neiman. I hope she will participate in this debate or, if not in this one, in some other debate on the subject, because she was very much involved in IPU direct action on human rights.

Obviously, the IPU is interested and involved in the overall general question of human rights of all humans, but it is also felt that it has a particular responsibility, and a particular role to play, in the human rights of parliamentarians. I emphasize that this is not to the exclusion of the rights of all humans.

However, because the IPU is a parliamentary group, it was felt that this was a particular area where it had a responsibility, and where there was the possibility of doing something concrete.

Senator Neiman was involved at an early stage in getting the IPU to accept a resolution whereby the IPU would take an active position in protecting the rights of parliamentarians. That resolution was passed. It certainly was not an easy one to get accepted, because there are a number of countries belonging to the IPU who are not particularly interested in having outsiders involved in what goes on within their boundaries. However, the resolution was passed, and I am pleased to say that it has resulted in substantial action.

We are dealing with a limited group, and there are only so many things that can be done. Nevertheless, up to this point the IPU has been able to investigate specifically 36 cases of parliamentarians whose human rights have been reported endangered. Of those 36 cases, six are considered closed and there is no reason to follow them up, five are still under investigation and 25 have been reported as genuine and in which action has been recommended. The action recommended is, in fact, specific action calling on parliamentarians and parliamentary groups to do something. The effective portion of the resolution reads:

Calls on the National Groups to take all such measures as they may deem suitable for the support of the decisions of the Inter-Parliamentary Union in this matter and to inform the Organization's Secretariat of their initiatives and the results obtained.

I think that reporting section is a very important element, because it means that our group, the Canadian group, must go back to the IPU and say, "This is what we have done as Canadians about the human rights of these people who have been identified as parliamentarians in certain countries, who are at present incarcerated or have been tortured."

To show the effect of this, I will read from the reply of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the IPU Canadian group, who sent him an outline of what the IPU had found in these cases:

I consider it most appropriate for the Inter-Parliamentary Union to concern itself with the human rights of present and former parliamentarians. Although its representations to Governments may not always result in direct or immediate improvements in the specific cases raised, I believe that in many cases the demonstration of the Union's concern about human rights can and does have a beneficial effect on the general human rights situation in the countries concerned.

Then the Secretary of State goes on to deal with each specific case that has been referred to him. In all of these cases the Canadian missions in the relevant countries have been informed that the Canadian Group has drawn the government's attention to the cases denounced by the Union, and the Canadian missions have been requested to make representations to the authorities of the countries concerned, and to follow closely the development of the situation with regard to those cases. He goes on to outline what has happened, and in each case what action has been taken.

I do not claim the IPU has been able to get so many people released, or the conditions of people in jail changed, in so many cases, but there are specific cases in which action has been taken where public pressure is now evident, and where those countries know that other countries are concerned; where the Canadian government has made it clear that it is concerned. This, I think, is a great forward step.

I commend those who have been involved in this process. I think it is an example of the kind of work we can accomplish through some of our inter-parliamentary groups.

Senator Thompson: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Is the only initiative of the Canadian IPU through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who will have the Canadian mission in the country involved ask about a parliamentarian whose rights are being abused? Is there a suggestion that perhaps the individual members of the Canadian IPU should write letters on behalf of the parliamentarian abroad who has been so abused?

Senator Molgat: Yes, certainly, individual members are urged to write, and to speak to any groups they can. We are urged to get our media to respond and so let the facts be known. Debates like this one are another method by which pressure can be exerted through public information. All methods are encouraged, and it is not limited to pressure by government. As individuals and collectively, all of us are urged to take part in this.

Senator Thompson: Perhaps I might just follow that up. Amnesty International will send background material on individuals on whose behalf they make representations to the members of Amnesty International. Is the Canadian IPU group sending background material on these parliamentarians, and a suggested course of action, to the individual Canadian members?

Senator Molgat: I am not sure whether that information has been sent directly to the Canadian membership of the IPU, but it is referred to in all the reports we send. I shall be pleased to find out whether a more direct appeal to each individual can be made. We obviously work in close co-operation with Amnesty International as well. Senator Neiman may have more information to give in that respect.

● (1510)

Senator Thompson's question regarding the information we have given to individual members of the IPU brings me to the conclusion of my remarks today. One of the problems faced by all honourable senators is the amount of material that comes across our desks. It is impossible to read all of it and to be aware of all the problems. In light of that, we are faced with the question of how to make Canadian parliamentarians more effective in interparliamentary groups. How can we make the IPU more meaningful? How can Canadian parliamentarians participate more actively?

[Senator Molgat.]

The first thing, obviously, is to be aware of the IPU. In that respect, I would urge all honourable senators to read the report on the last Bonn meeting. That report contains some very useful information. As I have said, it is impossible for honourable senators to read all of the material that comes to them, but to the extent individuals can be urged to do so I think that should be done. Perhaps we should consider another method by which to initiate more in-depth discussion on these subjects, and possibly the Foreign Affairs Committee would consider these reports as topics for discussion.

The Foreign Affairs Committee has just concluded a thorough and useful review of our relations with the United States. I do not believe there is on hand at the moment any major new investigative program for that committee, and it might well be that, as a continuing program, it could consider the reports of interparliamentary groups. This might be one means of bringing about more discussion on human rights and the other questions that come from these interparliamentary conferences.

I hope that we will have a more extended debate on this and other subjects covered in our report. It is important—and I am speaking now for the IPU, in which I am involved—that there be more involvement by individuals in the discussions prior to the conferences. We know, for example, that the spring conference is to be held in Prague in April of next year, and I hope that many more senators will offer themselves as potential delegates to that conference.

Senator Roblin: There is only one allowed, and he has to be a Liberal.

Senator Molgat: I realize there is a limitation on the number. That is normal. However, there is no restriction on the number that can make application. If only a few apply, notwithstanding the fact that there will be only one chosen, the possibility of getting more involvement is limited. I urge more to apply, and I urge more to be involved in the briefings in advance of that conference and subsequent conferences.

Senator Flynn: We on this side are excluded, so there is no sense in applying.

Senator Roblin: I am not going to apply. I am ruled out.

Senator Molgat: The representation, of course, depends on the total number attending. If honourable senators feel there should be a greater representation from the Senate on Canadian delegations to IPU conferences, the Senate might consider a greater contribution to the budget of the IPU. In this regard, the Senate in the past has not really made its contribution to parliamentary groups in relationship to numbers. I realize that these contributions have been increased, but they are still not in direct relationship to the numbers.

Senator Grosart: I would ask the honourable senator if he is quite sure of that, because there is clear agreement, entered into by the Senate, that its contribution is in exact relationship to the number of senators in the delegation. This has been adhered to very strictly, and is at the present moment being adhered to.

Senator Molgat: I was not referring to the actual number of senators on delegations, but to the total budget of the parliamentary group.

Senator Grosart: It is the same thing.

Senator Molgat: The Senate has 104 members and the House of Commons 264. Taking the relationship in terms of 104 to 264, the Senate is not contributing in that ratio to the budget.

Senator Grosart: Our contribution is higher.

Senator Molgat: No, it is less. It may well be that the House of Commons does not particularly want a different structure, but it is, I think, for the Senate to determine whether or not it wants to contribute more. According to the last budget I saw—and I stand to be corrected—the Senate is not contributing in the ratio of the membership of both houses.

So, I urge more involvement and, as well, more preparation—and this is something, I suppose, that really falls within the responsibilities of the IPU. In this respect, I speak as a Vice-President of the IPU and not simply as a delegate to this last conference. I think that when members of either house are members of a delegation, there has to be more time spent in getting ready for the meeting.

Having been a whip on this side, I know the pressures involved, but it is important to have more continuity in our representations. I say this with some hesitation, because it would appear to be somewhat self-serving for Senator Bonnell and I, having just been members of a delegation, to plead now for more continuity. But if we want a good delegation, and to have good representation and good work done by the members, it is important to have continuity. In that way, the delegates can fully participate. Because they are familiar with the background, they can be much more useful. I think the general experience is that one is much more effective at second and subsequent conferences of this kind than at the first. The first time around you are not familiar with the procedures, the people or the system. As a result, you simply cannot make the same kind of contribution as you can on second and subsequent occasions. For that reason, I feel that continuity is one factor that we should look at.

Another factor is more follow-up on the return of delegations. In this respect, the follow-up could take the form of reports to the Senate, provided that senators do not simply take the position that it is a travelogue. Travelogues are simply not that important. But in-depth discussion is something that we should have more of, and the delegates themselves, on their return, should get together to go over the process and express their ideas of how to do a better job next time.

It is my hope that we will have a more extended debate on this subject. I have by no means covered all of the topics dealt with at Bonn. I tried to cover those in which I felt Canadians have a particular concern, and in which I have a particular interest.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY PROBLEMS OF INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION IN THE MARKETING OF GRAINS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hazen Argue, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, November 14, 1978, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture be authorized to examine and report upon the problems of international co-operation in the marketing of grains and other agricultural products; and

That the committee, or any subcommittee so authorized by the committee, may adjourn from place to place for the purpose of such examination.

He said: Honourable senators, I thought I should take the opportunity, on moving this motion, to review the work of the committee in its study of the marketing of wheat, in particular, at our meetings in both Winnipeg and Washington. Before going into that subject, however, I want, as chairman of the committee, to express my thanks—and I am sure I speak for all members of the committee—to the Senate as a whole and to honourable senators individually for the support they have given the Agriculture Committee. I am pleased with the support and the work of the members of that committee. I know that they have very often attended meetings at real personal sacrifice, and I acknowledge the very effective work being done by the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Honourable senators, the motion before you is the same as that approved by you on May 25, 1978, when the committee requested authority to examine and report upon the problems of international co-operation in the marketing of grains and other agricultural products, because it believed it could play a useful role in furthering the possibilities of such co-operation—co-operation which it believed was in the interest of all Canadians.

The work we began last spring has not yet been completed and that is why we are asking the Senate to authorize the Agriculture Committee to continue its examination. The last session of Parliament, ending as it did, provided no opportunity for your committee to make its report. I should like to take a few moments now to inform you of what we have been doing, and why. I am hopeful that other members of the committee will further inform you by participating in the debate on this motion.

The primary objective of your committee has been to examine ways and means by which Canadian producers will be assured a fair and reasonable price for wheat, a price that is prevented from falling below the cost of production. It is our opinion that the best way to achieve this objective is for the wheat exporting countries of the world to co-operate with one another to assure our producers of this price.

It is a corollary of our objective that the importing countries will be assured of an adequate supply of wheat in the future. Without farm gate prices which cover the costs of efficient but recently established farmers, wheat production in the exporting countries cannot continue at the levels required to feed an ever-expanding world population. Nor should the consuming nations expect that this can be done.

I took the opportunity in April 1977, on my own initiative, to visit Washington and to make some contacts with senators and congressmen at that time, particularly the chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee and of the Agriculture Committee of the House of Representatives. The original stimulus for our efforts of last June was my approach to Senator McGovern of the United States. He suggested at this earlier meeting that it would be beneficial if committees of our two countries could get together from time to time. He made it known, in May of this year, that members of the United States Senate Agriculture Committee would be very pleased to meet with members of the Canada Senate Committee on Agriculture to explore the possibilities and the problems respecting international co-operation in the marketing of wheat. These preliminary discussions led to the meeting in Winnipeg.

Prior to our discussions with the senators from the United States in Winnipeg, we consulted, as a committee, carefully with the Canadian Wheat Board and with our own representatives at international wheat agreement negotiations. These consultations provided us with the necessary background information to begin discussions on such topics as the mechanisms available for exporter co-operation, and the possible difficulties that would be encountered with a co-operative arrangement together with suggestions for their solution. We were also fully briefed on the American farm support programs as they are now being administered. Our consultations further informed us about the Geneva and London negotiations for a new international wheat agreement.

The contacts which we established at that time have been maintained. Your committee has worked closely with the Honourable Otto Lang, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, with the Canadian Wheat Board itself and with other federal government officials. As chairman, I have discussed this whole question with the minister, Mr. Lang, on several occasions, and, along with the other senators who planned to make the trip to Washington, had a lengthy and valuable meeting with Mr. Lang and his officials prior to leaving for Washington.

It is fair to say that the conclusions reached by your committee after our discussions with the experts were rather pessimistic. The wheat exporting countries have for more than 10 years been following a course of confrontational and disastrous competition. There are no particular villains of the piece, for all the exporters—the United States, Australia, the Argentine and Canada—have undercut one another from time to time. The importers—many of them—have carefully shielded their markets from the influences of the world market. The economic policies of the centrally planned economies result in the purchase of wheat by the state agencies without altering the internal price structure, or permitting consumption to develop, or forcing production to meet the challenges of competition. The European Economic Community practises similar manipulations through its common agricultural policies, and actually benefits from direct subsidization from the pockets of our producers and our taxpayers through the levies which it adds.

If our wheat producers, for example, should take a dollar a bushel less for their wheat, this does not help the consumers of the European Economic Community; it merely results in an additional tax on our wheat going into those countries, and that additional sum of money is made available to the treasuries of those countries to support their agricultural producers, so the further we cut the price of wheat the more we assist farmers in other countries of the world.

The primary result of this situation, where almost all of the importing countries in one way or another, and for very good reasons, protect their consumers or their producers, or both, is that the world wheat market, that quantity of about seventy million tons that moves from the exporting nations to the importing nations, is subject to extreme fluctuation in price when there are minor shifts in supply. I am sure those of you who are acquainted with the wheat business will recall how our producers in the late 1960s and early 1970s suffered drastic reductions in the price of wheat. The normal sensible reaction to such a situation was to cut back production, to stop growing wheat, to control supply. That is what any manufacturer would have done. Huge price increases resulted a year or two later because production had been decreased, and there was a shortage of wheat in the importing countries very soon after.

Unfortunately, wheat producers in the exporting countries cannot predict disastrous droughts or frost in their home areas any more accurately than they can predict them in the other major producing areas of the world, China, Russia, Europe and even India. They cannot reduce or increase their production with the foreknowledge of surpluses or deficits in the world's markets, nor, for that matter, do they want to.

World demand is steadily increasing by one billion bushels a year. Canadian producers want to help satisfy that demand, and they want to do so at a fair price. Your committee agrees that that is a sensible and reasonable objective.

It was obvious to your committee that the negotiations under way in Geneva and London to achieve a new international wheat agreement would only partially meet this objective. The type of agreement being discussed, as has been explained to us, would provide for a system of reserve stocks that would be accumulated or dispersed according to an agreed-upon range of prices. As far as your committee has been able to discover—and the negotiations are continuing—the range of prices is not one which wheat producers in Canada would consider acceptable as it would not, at its lowest level—the stock accumulation level—cover the cost of production. It is not certain that an agreement will be reached, but even if it is, your committee is convinced that exporter co-operation will still be required to assure our wheat producers of a fair price, and to assure the consuming nations of sufficient supplies at fair prices.

With these problems and conclusions in mind, we went to Winnipeg to meet with the American senators to exchange ideas and to find out if there was common ground between us. The exchange of ideas was most valuable and the common ground was definitely there.

Three members of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry of the United States Senate came to Winnipeg and met with six members of our committee. The members of the committee from the United States were Senators George McGovern, Democrat, South Dakota; Henry Bellmon, Republican, Oklahoma; and John Melcher, Democrat, Montana. The senators representing the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture were Senators Hays, McDonald, Molgat, Roblin, Sparrow and myself. In addition, we invited to the meeting—and they accepted—the Honourable Otto Lang, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, and Mr. Esmond Jarvis, the Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board. Indeed, the Canadian Wheat Board considered the meeting to be of sufficient importance that all of its five members came. They were accompanied by Roy Atkinson, the Chairman of the Producers' Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board.

The American senators were accompanied by two prominent farm leaders, Mr. Robert Lewis, National Secretary of the National Farmers Union, and Mr. Ben Radcliffe, President of the South Dakota Farmers Union. The Honourable Harvey Wollman, Lieutenant Governor of South Dakota, was also in attendance.

From the opening statements made by Senator McGovern and myself, it was concluded that our objectives were quite similar. We were able to explore many ideas and problems, and to come to a number of positive conclusions. To this end the comments of Mr. Lang and the board members were most helpful and positive. The Canadian delegation did not have any basic disagreement among its membership. I think it is fair to say that the senators, the minister, the Canadian Wheat Board and the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee were in general agreement on what was being done.

The discussions quickly turned to a suggestion by the American senators that, as a means of achieving our basic objective, there should be a reasonable minimum or floor price at the farm gate in the exporting country.

The United States is the largest exporter of wheat. Its share of the market is now averaging between 40 and 50 per cent. Our share is roughly half the American share—between 20 and 25 per cent.

Since the failure of the last international wheat agreement, the world price has been determined by the price at which the American exporters are willing to sell. Other exporting countries have been price followers, I would suggest, and not price leaders. The world floor price is also set by the American market, but its level is determined by the United States farm price support legislation.

The United States government offers price-support loans on wheat and other agricultural products which permits producers, when the price falls to the loan level, to store their grain. The loan level at the present time in the United States is $2.35 per bushel, far below even the most conservative estimates of the cost of production. The wheat exporting countries cannot purchase much below the loan level and so this sets the American floor and, because of the dominance of the United States in the world market, this effectively establishes the world floor.

The American senators wanted to discuss with Canada what we would do if the United States government raised their own loan rate significantly. This suggestion for establishing a reasonable world floor price was not new to us or to the minister or to the wheat board. Indeed, the Canadian Wheat Board has, for some time, been studying the implications and the advantages of such action.

The members of your committee stated their opinion that the Canadian wheat system was so arranged that Canada could easily enter into a co-operative pricing arrangement if the American government were to raise the loan rate. The Honourable Otto Lang stated clearly and categorically that Canada would support the actions of the United States, or those of any other exporting country, to assure a fair producer-return from the international market.

Mr. Esmond Jarvis, Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, stated that the Board could, by pricing in appropriate relationship to the United States selling prices, govern with fair precision the quantities of Canadian wheat that would be sold or retained.

As I mentioned earlier, this was an exploratory meeting but, even so, all of the participants agreed that considerable progress had been made. The Canadian Wheat Board had, in its presentation to the meeting, suggested that Canada and the United States could establish a small task force of senior marketing officers to identify the costs and benefits to each country of close exporter co-operation, and to outline the means by which such co-operation could be achieved. The senators discussed this suggestion and agreed it was a recommendation they should make. The Honourable Otto Lang agreed that the task force would be an appropriate means of continuing discussions of this important subject.

Our meeting in Winnipeg ended with the suggestion by the United States senators that our discussion should continue, and that the next meeting should be in Washington in the near future.

I might say that when this meeting opened, Senator Henry Bellmon, who is a ranking Republican on the committee of United States Senate, said he was not convinced that Canada would co-operate with the United States in any pricing understanding. He said that the Canadian Wheat Board would move in and undercut them, and the Americans would suffer on that account. However, when the meeting was over, he said he was leaving Winnipeg to go back to the United States more than half convinced that Canada would, in fact, co-operate with the United States in any mutually-agreed-to pricing arrangement in a way that would not only protect Canadian interests, but would also assure that American legitimate interests were protected. We felt that was a major accomplishment, namely, that a ranking Republican on the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry of the United States was moving towards support of the position being taken by the Canadian delegation.

Upon their return to Washington, Senators McGovern, Bellmon and Melcher wrote to President Carter to apprise him of their discussions with ourselves, the Honourable Otto Lang and the Canadian Wheat Board. They recommended to President Carter that the task force be established, and that Australia and the Argentine be invited to participate, and that the composition of the task force be extended to include representatives of the major national farmers' organizations.

Up until this point, at any rate, the United States administration has not seen fit to agree to the establishment of this task force.

In September, after the Winnipeg meeting, I received a letter from the Honourable Herman Talmadge, Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry of the United States Senate, inviting the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture to come to Washington for just such a meeting. This Senate was, of course, adjourned for the summer, and the committee's terms of reference did not authorize it to make a journey outside Canada. However, I discussed this invitation with members of the committee, and also with other senators whose opinion I very much respect. Each one I spoke to felt that we would be serving a useful purpose by accepting the invitation. Senators Harry Hays, A. H. McDonald, Bud Olson, Duff Roblin, Herb Sparrow and Paul Yuzyk said they would like to make the trip, and agreed that the invitation should be accepted.

I might say that prior to going to Washington we had a meeting with the Honourable Otto Lang and with William Miner, who heads the Canadian delegation to the International Wheat Agreement, and found their attitude to be positive and supportive. They encouraged us to follow through with this initiative.

Our delegation was composed of Senators Hays, Roblin, Yuzyk and myself, and we were accompanied by Mr. Albert Chambers, our own research director; Mr. Bill Spafford, a senior economist with the Canadian Wheat Board; and Mr. Don Caldwell the agricultural secretary of the Canadian Embassy in Washington. We appreciate the excellent advice they gave our committee, and I know that I speak for all members of the delegation when I say they were most helpful.

We believe that our meeting in Washington was a success, because it enabled us to broaden our own perspective, and it enabled the members of the United States Congress to meet with Canadian senators.

On arriving in the United States on the day before our Wednesday meeting, we were guests at a luncheon hosted by Senator Herman Talmadge, Chairman of the Senate Agricultural Committee and had an opportunity to meet unofficially with United States senators and some of their agricultural leaders.

At our meeting on September 27 we met with seven members of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry. They were Senator George McGovern, Democrat, South Dakota; Senator Henry Bellmon, Republican, Oklahoma; Senator Pete Domenici, Republican, New Mexico; Senator Kaneaster Hodges, Democrat, Arkansas; Senator John Melcher, Democrat, Montana; Senator Milton Young, Republican, North Dakota; and Senator Edward Zorinsky, Democrat, Nebraska. In addition, attending that meeting was Senator Frank Church as a visitor and interested party. His presence was of great importance because he is slated to be the next Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, which is an important committee dealing with foreign matters.

While it was called a Senate meeting, six members of the House of Representatives from wheat growing states attended and participated. They were representatives Dan Glickman, Democrat, Kansas; Jack Hightower, Democrat, Texas; Ron Marlenee, Republican, Montana; Keith Sebelius, Republican, Kansas; and Mr. Harold Volkmer, Democrat, Missouri.

I might say, incidentally, that our meeting was held in the largest committee room in the Capitol Building. Its official name is the Caucus Room, but they said that since the Watergate hearings it had been known as the Watergate Room. It is a very large room, and also attending the meeting were approximately 100 leaders of the main farm organizations in the United States. The meeting was covered by three American television networks, and, as a Canadian taking part in the meeting, I was much impressed and greatly honoured. It may not be modest of me to say so, but all four senators comprising the delegation took an active part in the discussion, held their own, and did a good job for Canada's wheat producers.

The Washington discussions were to some extent a continuation of those that took place in Winnipeg, but this time with more senators and congressmen participating. It should be clearly stated that while there was some necessary repetition, there were also new ideas suggested and new initiatives undertaken.

Senator McGovern, who chaired the meeting, proposed that the best means of raising prices at the farm gate was to increase "modestly" the support loan levels. This, he stated, would be neither a "great" nor "radical" change, for it would leave the existing farm support system to "function in the same way that it does now."

Senator Henry Bellmon, whom I mentioned earlier, made an alternative suggestion as to how Canada, the United States, and perhaps the other wheat exporters, could co-operate to achieve fair prices for their producers. He proposed the establishment of an "international grain exporting stabilization commission," which would be composed of exporters and would issue export licences based on historic shares of world markets within an agreed price range. Senator Bellmon recommended a range of between $4.50 and $6 per bushel for the port, which would return about 50 cents less at the farm gate.

Our position at these discussions was one of flexibility. Senator Roblin emphasized that we as Canadians were not seeking or recommending changes in the American grain marketing system or in the basic government programs. He, Senator Hays and Senator Yuzyk emphasized at various times that our wheat marketing system could be adapted to a co-operative arrangement if an acceptable mechanism could be found. Our primary purpose was to express the assurances which we had from the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, the Honourable Otto Lang, and from the board itself, that Canada could participate in an acceptable arrangement, and that we believed that substantive discussions on the alternatives should begin.

United States senators made most valuable contributions. If I may be permitted an evaluation, I would say that they were all very eager to have some type of arrangement discussed and investigated, and they were most upset that the Carter administration had not yet taken a positive attitude toward their suggestions.

When Mr. Thomas Hughes, an official of the Department of Agriculture, was asked for his comments and for some indication of the administration's position, he was less than encouraging. The United States senators, in turn, were less praiseworthy of their own Administration's efforts, such as the very modest increase of 10 cents per bushel in their loan rate.

Discussions then moved on to appropriate steps that could be taken to increase the understanding of senators of the problems involved in co-operation. Senator McGovern announced for Senator Herman Talmadge, the Chairman of the Agriculture Committee, that that committee had commissioned a study "to be undertaken by outstanding agricultural economists of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges of the feasibility of co-operation between the United States and Canada" in the pricing of wheat for export. Senator Bellmon, in his statement to the meeting, had suggested that a joint working group of the agriculture committees of the Canadian and United States Senates be formed.

After some discussion the meeting concluded that an ad hoc working group, composed of the professional staffs of the committees and the senators' staffs, would be struck to continue studies of the various proposals, and to establish liaison on this matter. It was also suggested that the staff of the House of Representatives agricultural committee be included. This meeting with the members of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry of the United States ended optimistically, and I would say justifiably so.

Later the same day we had the opportunity of meeting with Congressman Thomas Foley, Chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, again with Congressmen Hightower and Marlenee, and with members of the committee staff. At that time we reviewed the morning's discussions and our ideas on co-operation, and had a frank discussion of the problems that a co-operative arrangement might encounter in the House of Representatives. Congressman Foley expressed his interest in having the House committee staff join our ad hoc group, but he cautioned us that while almost every senator has at least one wheat farmer in his state, many congressmen do not—obviously not the congressmen representing large cities in the United States.

I, for one, do not believe that such a realization should result in pessimism, but rather we should conclude that this multiplies our challenge, and should spur us to greater effort in aid of the objective we believe will have considerable benefit for Canada and for our wheat producers.

After this meeting we were given a reception by the National Farmers Union, hosted by Tony Deschant, the President, at which we had the opportunity to meet personally the many leaders of the major United States agricultural organizations, who had come to Washington to listen to and be part of our deliberations.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to go on much longer, but I would like to say that our visit to Washington permitted us to have discussions on more than international co-operation in the marketing of wheat. Our group met with Congressman Neal Smith, Chairman of the House Small Business Committee, and his staff, to discuss their investigation of the marketing of beef in the United States, this being, of course, of relevance to our committee's continuing inquiry into the Canadian beef industry. We also met with Mr. Bill McMillan, Vice-President of the National Cattlemen's Association, to discuss the international trade in beef. These discussions were most enlightening, and I believe will prove useful to the committee in its work ahead.

I might say that after returning from Washington I was honoured with an invitation to speak at the annual convention of the South Dakota National Farmers Union, which took place on October 10, South Dakota being the state from which Senator George McGovern comes. I was pleased to go to that convention, and I enjoyed it very much. Since that time I have received a letter from Senator Henry Bellmon, and an invitation on behalf of our committee to attend the annual meeting in Oklahoma City of the Oklahoma Wheat Growers Association. This meeting is called for December 1. After I had received that invitation I received another one to attend the annual convention of the Texas Wheat Producers Association, to be held in Texas on the day prior to the Oklahoma meeting. I think, therefore, that the co-operation that was initiated in Winnipeg, and continued in the United States, is just the beginning, and that there will be, and should be, further contacts between Canadian senators and United States senators, and between the members of our staff and members of the staffs of those committees in the United States.

To conclude my remarks I would like to review with you the benefits that would flow from co-operation between the wheat exporting countries. The primary benefit would be higher farm gate prices in Canada for the wheat which our farmers grow and sell. This would encourage them to maintain production during times when small surpluses would otherwise force them to cut back. Production of constant—indeed, of increasing—supplies of wheat by the exporting countries is essential if the populations of the importing countries are to be able to purchase the quantities they desire when they need them, and at prices which are reasonable. Stability of production can only be achieved through stability of price, but the prices must cover the production costs of the efficient producers, as even price stability will not be a sufficient incentive for all of the increased production that is required.

The multiplier effects of sufficient farm incomes are well known, and hardly need repeating. A producer who is confident of reasonable prices spends his income on improving his efficiency. He purchases the latest farm equipment, uses more fertilizer, farms better and assists the general economy of the country. If the money from higher prices of wheat flows into the rural economy and into the factories of Canada year in and year out, its value is far greater than if producers, because of low prices, cease to buy machinery or other inputs for several years, as happened not long ago.

Last year, 1977-78, we sold over 15 millions tons of wheat, including Durum. If the price had been one dollar higher, that would have meant an additional $550 million of foreign exchange earnings, a stimulus to the economy much of which would have come from countries which already charge their own consumers of imported wheat as much as twice the price that our producers receive.

Today, when the government is bringing down a budget, it would be wise to consider that not only would the farmers be earning significant sums to help balance our trade and stabilize our dollar, but they would not have needed the payments being made this year out of the western grain stabilization fund, and they would have paid more, instead of less, in taxes. Thus, the benefits of co-operative pricing are many.

Some people have called what we have advocated a cartel, but we suggest that this kind of arrangement is necessary in the interests of the wheat producers. I would say that it is far better to have some arrangement that provides our producers with acceptable incomes, and consumers with assured supplies at reasonable prices, than to have a wholly uncertain situation in international wheat export markets.

I hope that the Senate will approve this motion. I believe that the committee has done, and will continue to do, useful work on this subject—work that will benefit Canada and Canadian farmers.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-5, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read a second time?

Senator Petten moved, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday next, November 20.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, November 20, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

The Senate met at 4 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE SENATE

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not know whether I should be the one to do so or whether it should be someone on the other side, but I think it is our duty to raise a question of privilege affecting the Senate, which bears on our recall today at 4 o'clock rather than at 8 o'clock. The question of privilege relates to what was said in the House of Commons on Thursday last as a result of the Senate's not proceeding with consideration of Bill C-5. The bill came to us as we were about to adjourn. At that time it was given first reading, following which there was a motion that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading today. But at 5 o'clock in the other place—

Senator McIlraith: At 4.52.

Senator Flynn: The honourable senator says 4.52. I was not here, so I do not know. Yes, perhaps it was indeed 4.52. At any rate, a point of order was raised by no one other than the honourable member for Winnipeg North Centre. Naturally, it is to be expected that if he has an occasion to criticize this house he will seize it.

In any case, speaking about this bill, he said:

This bill was passed and sent to the other place this afternoon. However, my understanding is that although in the other place the bill was given first reading, Their Honours refused to proceed with it on second reading today. The result is that every day's delay means that seven more widows do not get—

He was then interrupted, but Mr. Knowles continued:

Mr. Speaker, on my point of order I am asking if the government House leader will have consultation with Their Honours in the Senate to see if they cannot meet again today and deal with this matter.

Then Miss Bégin spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I also heard this Senate report about which I inquired. I would like to thank hon. members, particularly my colleagues on the opposition side, who would have liked to take part in the debate this afternoon but who, having already expressed their views, agreed to withhold their additional remarks so that we could pass this bill unanimously. This is a bill which will give senior citizens $300 million in 1979 but which means starting from today a possible loss of money each day for those who receive the spouse's allowance, and I would like to say that in this case the Senate does not help speed up the business of the House.

There was something said by Mr. Speaker, which I do not think I need quote, and then Mr. Baker suggested that he would agree to proceed very quickly with an amendment to make this bill applicable retroactively or to bring it into force at any time that would be decided. However, the worst was to come from none other than the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council, and House leader in the other place, the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, who said:

Mr. Speaker, in reply to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I should say that when the House gave third reading to this bill, the Old Age Security Act amendment, we transmitted that information through the normal channels to the other place with the suggestion that, because of the needs that have been pointed out, particularly the benefits that would accrue to widows, action should be taken as quickly as possible and that we would attempt to arrange royal assent in order to provide that the bill be fully in effect before the end of the day.

Like other hon. members I regret that the Senate did not take action on that bill and that it adjourned without dealing with it. There is no way I can have consultations with members of the other place.

That is rather surprising, because I have noted many occasions where there have been consultations. Mr. MacEachen continued:

I would just ask my colleagues in the House of Commons if they do not think now that the proposals made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with respect to the Senate—

And then there were interruptions, some in favour of what the minister said and some against. My point of privilege is that that criticism of this place was unwarranted. I am quite sure that no one here knew that this bill would be passed so quickly that day. It had been hanging around in the other place since October 16. That was the date of the first reading. Debate on the bill commenced on October 26, 10 days later. According to Mr. Knowles, 70 widows would already have been losing their benefits. Debate resumed on November 16—another 10 days and, of course, another 70 widows denied the benefits of this bill.

Senator Langlois: Or widowers.

Senator Flynn: Or widowers. Mr. Knowles used the word "widows." I have not seen the bill.

Senator Langlois: It applies to both.

Senator Flynn: There is perhaps a question of equality there between men and women. Perhaps men are not favoured as much as women under this bill. We shall find that out. Anyway, Mr. Knowles mentioned only widows. It is more touching, of course.

My understanding—and I think it was the understanding of the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate—was that in the other place they would deal only with Bill C-7, the borrowing authority, on that day and that was the bill urgently required to be passed. Apparently, from what I have heard, Bill C-5 was called suddenly by the Honourable Monique Bégin.

There were a few minutes hesitation and then everyone said “Okay, pass it.” We were not warned in advance, nor were we warned of the possible consequences, and I consider it totally unfair that we were subjected to the remarks in the other place that I have just quoted. Had we been told, we could have made the necessary arrangements.

It seems to me that the government is at fault in this respect because, first, we were not warned, and, secondly, when a bill such as this takes effect only on the date it receives royal assent, it puts pressure on both houses. The other place took over one month to deal with it, and they said the Senate should have approved it in two hours.

Senator McIlraith: In 52 minutes.

Senator Flynn: In 52 minutes, or thereabouts. Parliament, the House of Commons as well as the Senate, should not be subjected to this kind of pressure or, I should even say, blackmail. Moreover, I do not think that under the circumstances it was fair of the government, and particularly the house leader in the other place, to have made those remarks. I know very well that some people, since Bill C-60 was tabled, would like to find new arguments for precipitating the demise of the Senate; but as far as this situation is concerned I think that we have acted responsibly, and that the error, if there was one, was the government's, and, more precisely, that of the house leader in the other place.

● (1610)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is most important that the sequence of events and the facts be placed squarely on the record of this chamber.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition with respect to what all honourable senators regard as a very regrettable incident last Thursday. The record shows that under every and all circumstances the Senate endeavours to co-operate constructively in assisting the passage of legislation in Parliament, especially when that legislation affects the welfare and lives of people in need. That has been the consistent record of the Senate down through the years, and certainly through the course of this Parliament.

I can only suggest that the sequence of events in the other place on Thursday was not anticipated or that there was a failure in communication, which cannot be attributed to anyone on this side.

[Senator Langlois.]

If we look at page 171 of Senate Hansard for November 9, 1978, we find that the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate made the following remarks:

In addition to the two Senate bills already on the order paper for Tuesday, it is likely that there will be one and perhaps two bills introduced in the Senate next week. I have been informed—

And so we had in fact been informed.

—that Bill C-5, to amend the Old Age Security Act, and Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, are expected to pass in the Commons this week and come to the Senate. We should also have Bill C-7, the Borrowing Authority Act, 1978-79-80, early next week.

Such was the advice we received after consultation with the other place on the morning of November 9. May I say that there was a special desire on the part of many senators to expedite the passage of Bill C-5, a measure to help certain senior citizens of this country. The Commons, in its wisdom or otherwise, proceeded, however, to debate other measures and Bill C-5 did not come to us when expected. It may be inexplicable to certain senators that a bill that affects critically the lives and the welfare of at least seven more surviving spouses each and every day would be put aside and other measures debated. The members of the other place proceeded, nevertheless, to debate other measures, including unemployment insurance legislation, and did not proceed again with Bill C-5 until November 16.

On November 16—and this has been touched upon in part by the Leader of the Opposition—the Deputy Leader of the Government in this place, in his statement on the motion to adjourn the Senate to November 20, as reported at page 200 of Hansard, stated it was his information that Bill C-5 might pass on November 16. However, there was no guarantee that this would happen; there was no assurance that Bill C-5 could be brought to the Senate in time for any kind of meaningful action before the end of last week.

By the time the Senate was advised that the bill had been given third reading by the House of Commons, a motion that the Senate be adjourned from Thursday until 8 p.m. today, November 20, had been adopted by the Senate. By the time word had arrived from the other place, as honourable senators are aware, the decision taken by the Senate was to sit again at 8 o'clock Monday evening.

In addition, let me put on the record this chronology. Bill C-5, a bill that is going to affect the welfare of many senior citizens in Canada, was introduced on October 16. Ten days later, on October 26, the minister responsible for this measure—and I have the greatest respect for the honourable minister—in an eloquent speech in the other place, as reported at page 508 of Commons Hansard, emphasized “an urgency to which nobody can remain indifferent.” On October 27 the bill was referred to the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. The bill was reported back unanimously from the committee without amendment on November 9. That is when it was assumed here that a bill of this "urgency" would have been sent over to the Senate as quickly as possible so that it could be debated and assented to. Unexpectedly and inexplicably, as I said earlier, third reading came seven days later—only on November 16. Yet on that date, representatives of all parties in the other place indicated their deep concern about bereaved spouses and their view that Parliament should act quickly to assist them. They urged that the legislation be speeded. Unfortunately, it was too late for us to act by the time the bill reached the Senate.

On being apprised of the events in the other place last Thursday, I communicated with my colleague, the government house leader in the other place, and discussed with him what I considered to be a rather serious misunderstanding of the Senate's position. I also reached the Leader of the Opposition in this house to discuss with him the earliest feasible time that the Senate could proceed to deal with Bill C-5. This is the reason we are here at 4 o'clock this afternoon.

Honourable senators, when the ability and the willingness of the Senate to deal with any measure, major or otherwise, that may come before Parliament is called into question, then, in my view, we speak as one in this chamber, regardless of our party affiliation. We are willing and we are prepared, if proper notice is given and we are advised in time.

The bill we have before us is not a complicated one. It is a very simple but important bill. I will not get into the debate on the bill itself, but it is the kind of short, but important bill that I feel Parliament should have been able to deal with far sooner than it has. It deserves support. I know that other honourable senators will want to speak on this matter. I regard it as a matter of great importance reflecting, as it does, on the integrity of this chamber.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, since I am replying to the sponsor of the bill on the increases in old age security payments, I must say that I am very angry at what has occurred, and I join in the expression of anger of my leader. I am angered because a mistaken impression has already gone out to the people of Canada. I would refer honourable senators to the Canadian Press story in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, with the headline:

MPs angered as Senate delays passage of aid for needy elderly.

There is one paragraph that shows the phoniness and the mistaken impression, which says:

The legislation moved through all stages without debate as the opposition and government agreed that many widows need the extra help provided by it.

That gives the impression that the whole bill went through without debate.

Indeed, as was said by the government leader and by my own leader, it took a month to go through the other place, so the honourable member for Winnipeg North Centre makes a phony statement when he says:

That fact is that more than 200 times a month, the situation arises where a spouse in the 60 to 65 year range loses the older spouse and loses the allowance.

They took a month. They made their phony political point, but they were not worried about the fact that 200 spouses would be denied that allowance, and they put blame on the Senate where no blame can be properly directly.

As a new member of this chamber, I resent the implication that I, who for ten years in the House of Commons supported the needs and welfare of senior citizens, have denied them this allowance. This impression is created by an article that has gone out to all the people of Canada.

I resent also the implication that this chamber is not just as concerned as the other place, if not more concerned, with the welfare of our senior citizens. That we are concerned has been written historically, as exemplified many times by the committee work carried on under Senator Croll on poverty, aging and retirement, and other exemplary work carried out by the committees of this house.

It is unfortunate that the Deputy Prime Minister should indicate his regret, when the other place was warned by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, when she first introduced the bill, of the danger that if the bill did not go through quickly, many people would lose the spouse's allowance. Indeed, I called the Administration Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and found there is no emergency with regard to the $20 increase per household. The deadline for it is December 15. Indeed, as the opposition house leader in the other place said, if passage of the bill took an extra little while, it could be made retroactive. Nobody is losing anything, although they mistakenly try to put blame on the Senate.

It is a ridiculous situation, and it is no wonder that the people of Canada are losing faith in politicians. It is a lack of courtesy; it is unfair; and it is a lack of esprit de corps. I hope that the honourable leader will be able to impress that on the other place, and will indicate by press release or other means that this ridiculous situation, which should not have happened, will not happen again.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to raise one other point with respect to this question of privilege, but before I do I want to express my agreement with the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government in this house. I can say that I was more than a little disturbed by the allegations that were made in the House of Commons, especially when I examined—and it did not take many minutes—the sequence of events being talked about.

The first point is that the government house leader, according to page 1197 of Hansard of Thursday, November 16, 1978 said:

There is no way I can have consultations with members of the other place.

Honourable senators know that he may be technically correct in that there is no mechanism by which he can have consultations with the members of this chamber, but surely there is a mechanism in place by which he can send messages to the leader of this house. It constitutes at least some measure of consultation if they at least advise him what they are planning to do, especially when faced with a situation such as this one, where there is unanimous agreement by all parties in the other place that on November 16 they will expedite passage of this bill. There is no need to go back to when it was debated on October 26, to the committee proceedings on October 27, and so on. At least, on November 16 it was apparently decided, after consultation with the leaders of the parties in the House of Commons, to give quick passage to this bill. That is evident from page 1188 of Commons Hansard, where the member for Winnipeg North Centre raises it.

At page 1189, the house leader of the House of Commons, the Deputy Prime Minister, says, "I would be prepared to call Bill C-5 as the first item today if I had some understanding that it would be passed without debate . . ." Then he goes on to explain that he would not call it as the first item unless there was agreement it would be passed without debate. There was the other bill, the borrowing authority bill, Bill C-7, that had higher priority up to that point in time because there was a time limit on its passage.

At page 1190, less than 10 minutes later perhaps, there is this:

MR. SPEAKER: Do I understand it is the disposition of the House that Bill C-5 be called now, on the understanding that it will be dealt with, without debate?

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare then moved that the bill, as reported without amendment, be concurred in, and the bill passed through all the remaining stages in the other place.

I do not know when the bill got over here, but I assume that it was introduced in this house for first reading as soon as it was received. I am not quite sure of the channel by which the other place sends a formal message to this house, but no doubt that takes a few minutes. Looking at the times noted in both our record and the record of the House of Commons, not very much time lapsed between the time the bill passed all stages in the other place and the time it was introduced here.

I put these views forth in support of the remarks made by the two leaders in the Senate. The criticism of this house that was voiced in the other place at, as was pointed out, 4.52 p.m. on Thursday last was certainly unfair criticism. But what I find to be the most severe criticism, if not damaging, is the statement by the government house leader in the other place that he has no means of communication with the Senate. I do not accept that, but if it is true, then something ought to be done about it. If no channels of communication exist between the other place and the Senate to facilitate co-operation in the passage of a given bill, then surely such channels ought to be established. Given that the government house leader made such a categorical statement that he has no means of communication, surely we have to set up that mechanism.

[Senator Olson.]

Criticism of this place should be open to anyone, including members of the other place, but such criticisms ought to be based on fact and fairness. When I look at the facts and the sequence of events that took place in this case. I find criticisms to be neither factual nor fair.

I would hope that the government leader in the Senate will give us some indication of what kind of communications mechanism is in place now to inform the Senate of when these things are going to take place. It may be that this was one of those unusual instances when it was decided at the very last minute to give this bill speedy passage, and if that is the case, then certainly any complaint that the Senate did not move is unfounded. If they simply did not advise anyone in this house that they had made the decision to move quickly on this measure, the criticism is even more unfair.

I have had enough experience in the other house, as have a number of honourable senators, to know how difficult it is to get the agreement of all of the parties to pass a bill through more than one stage without debate and, indeed, to move it through more than one stage on the same day. It is certainly not something that happens in five minutes. There must have been discussions going on at least earlier in the day, and I believe—I was going to say "I suspect"—I believe that there were discussions going on even before Thursday in relation to the fact that they might come to the point where they would pass this bill through all remaining stages on the same day. Given those facts, I think it is most unfair to make the kind of criticisms of this place that were made on Thursday last.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government could inform the Senate as to what channels of communication are now in place. If it is a case of inadequate means of communication, then surely we ought to take steps to improve the situation.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there has never been any difficulty whatsoever in the area of communications between the other place and the Senate—never at any time. Contact was made at 11.45 on Thursday morning with the office of the government house leader in the other place with respect to the order of business in that place for Thursday afternoon. The house leader's office was advised that the Senate required this information in order to determine the time and date of its next sitting. Had the Senate been advised that negotiations were going on with a hope of achieving unanimous agreement in the other place to pass Bill C-5 on Thursday afternoon, then certainly the Senate would have remained and endeavoured to get an agreement to proceed with the bill on Thursday and, if necessary, on Friday, or as long as required, in order to assist the bereaved senior citizens of this country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: I do not wish to place any kind of construction on the incomplete remarks by the government house leader in the other place, which remarks appear in Commons Hansard of Thursday, November 16. I can say, however, that there has never been any difficulty with respect to communications between the two houses. Indeed, we have had a good and continuing communication on a daily basis with the office of the government house leader in the other place, and the proposed business of the Commons and of the Senate is discussed and reviewed regularly.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might put two more questions to the government leader. I believe he said that his office had communicated with the office of the government house leader at 11.45 a.m. I am wondering whether he was advised at that time that this bill was to be sent to the Senate later that day.

Senator Perrault: No, there was no such information, and there was no call-back until late in the afternoon on Thursday, and that was at a time when the decision to adjourn had already been taken. Indeed, by the time the bill arrived in the Senate, the adjournment motion had already been put.

Senator Olson: Did the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicate to the government leader in this house at any time on Thursday, and particularly up until 3 o'clock in the afternoon, that she had agreement for expeditious passage of this bill?

Senator Perrault: No information of any kind was received with respect to the idea of an all-party agreement.

Before taking my seat, may I say that it has always been a simple matter for me to communicate with any of my colleagues by simply picking up the telephone and sharing with them important matters which may arise from time to time.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I think we are all being much too polite about this situation. Here in the Senate we are used to being on the receiving end of criticism. We do not very often hand it out. But I think this is an occasion on which we should. It seems to me that the facts that have been disclosed in this discussion on the question of privilege raised by Senator Flynn indicate that statements have been made that are not true; that statements were made by ministers in the other place that are untrue. For example, I quote: "There is no way I can have consultations with members of the other place." This is a statement made by the government house leader in the other place, the Deputy Prime Minister, and I am told here today that that is untrue. The Leader of the Government in the Senate—and I have no hesitation in completely accepting what he has said—has said that is not so. The statement is obviously untrue.

The minister who made the statement sits in the same cabinet with the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and if the Leader of the Government in the Senate is not in that cabinet to be available for consultation, what is he there for? The statement is untrue, and let's say so.

And it has spawned another untrue statement, this one by the Canadian Press. The Canadian Press is not just one reporter; it is not just some reporter who is uninformed about parliamentary procedure and what happens in the House of Commons and in the Senate. This is supposed to be a responsible agency which has the major, if not almost the total, responsibility of communicating to the public of Canada what happens in Parliament. Yet here they are again with blatant mistakes. This is a long way from the first time that the Canadian Press has been stupid, ignorant and wrong. I would hope that we would call this to the attention of Canadian Press.

● (1640)

Senator Croll: Nothing worse than that, I hope.

Senator Grosart: I would hope that we would call to the attention of Canadian Press officials this kind of statement referred to: "The legislation moved through all stages without debate as the opposition and government agreed that many widows need the extra help provided for them."

Well, it has been made quite clear that it did not pass through all stages quickly. It took over a month. Surely it is time that we took the initiative, if nobody else will, of talking to those who are responsible for the dissemination of news through Canadian Press that the time has come for them to have competent reporters and particularly competent editors.

This material often comes in—and I take it that this is what happened in this case—from a mere perusal of the Hansard of the other place and to some extent our Hansard. No doubt there were Canadian Press reporters there, or they may have picked it up, as they often do, from other papers.

I think we have the responsibility now to call to the attention of Canadian Press the irresponsibility of this kind of reporting. If anybody interested in Canadian Press wishes to come and discuss some other examples, some blatant examples, not just referring to the Senate but blatant examples of ignorant and incompetent reporting of the affairs of the Parliament of Canada, I will be glad to co-operate and to give him some examples that I have in my files.

I referred to the leader of the house. Well, what about the departmental minister? The minister has said that the Senate does not help speed up the business of this house, referring to this specific case. The minister is suggesting that perhaps, as the Leader of the Government here has suggested, it was a failure of communication. It was more than that. It was a failure of consideration for these widows and spouses, whoever they are, who may be affected. It was a failure of consideration on the part of the minister, because surely it was up to the minister, if she was this concerned about the speedy passage of this bill, to take the trouble to communicate with the leader or his representative here and say, "This is coming up. Will you help speed it up?"

I would conclude by saying that if the House of Commons, if the minister—any minister, the Prime Minister, the deputy minister—wants assurance that, when the government has a bill for which a good case can be made for speedy passage here, it will receive it. All the government has to do is look first of all at the record achieved by the present Leader of the Government in this place and the complaints that have been made on our side about his pushing us too hard in this respect. The leadership of the government in this Senate cannot be accused of not pushing us hard enough to get bills through.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, as a senior citizen I protest here. Actually, I think I would have done exactly what the minister did; it has been done dozens of times. Those of us who served in the House of Commons know that every now and then a bill waits its turn until word is received from the other side, "All right. We are ready to let that bill go through today," and it goes through. That is what happens. That is fine. It is a nice easy way of doing it and it avoids needless time.

But let's tell the people what really happened here. For seven days this bill was on the table of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and was not moved; then in one day it was brought up, and because we could not pass it that same particular day all the blame is put on us—or at least that is what they are attempting to do. And yet, as I say, for seven days, from the 9th to the 16th, that bill was on the minister's table, or it was on the government leader's table, waiting to be introduced in the house. But it was not. Then when it is finally introduced and they want it passed in one day, they immediately are looking for a scapegoat.

Well, that is what the public ought to know. The public ought to know that they are seven times as guilty as they suggest we are. As a matter of fact, it was just unfortunate.

But when you talk about lack of communication, the honourable gentleman (Senator Olson) has been in Parliament long enough to know that, with respect to lines of communication, they have worn out the corridor here and the telephone line finding things out. Every time you ask something of the leader he says, "Wait until I find out from the house what they are going to do about this." So the communication has always been there. It was there in your day when you were a member there, and it was there in my day when I was. So there is no difficulty about that.

But I must say that I am really a little surprised that the Minister of National Health and Welfare would make those remarks. Mind you, she is a junior and perhaps the words just slipped out of her mouth. But for MacEachen to say what he did does not go down well, because he is a senior, and he is only using it for the purpose of saying, "Yes, the government are right in attempting to abolish the Senate" or "change the name of the Senate", or "disguise the Senate as something else" or whatever they have in mind—at least they have forgotten about that for the time being. But to use this situation for that purpose is not the action of the MacEachen I used to know. Even so, I respect him very much.

I think the simple thing to do is leave it in the minds of the public that for seven days the government did nothing at all about this bill and then immediately attempted to rush it and get it through the Senate. So what took them from October 16 to November 16, a month, they expected us to pass in one day, without even giving us notice that we should pass it.

An Hon. Senator: Two hours!

Senator Croll: Or two hours, as you say. Well, we cannot be that efficient.

Senator Olson: It is really more serious than that. Actually, if we had had one day's notice, I think we could have done it.

[Senator Croll.]

But, at page 1197 of Hansard in the other place, Mr. Knowles says this:

This bill was passed and sent to the other place this afternoon. However, my understanding is that although in the other place the bill was given first reading, Their Honours refused to proceed with it on second reading today.

Now, that is pretty serious, because they say we refused. We never even had a chance. We were never asked to move it to second reading.

Senator Langlois: If I may be allowed to answer the last remark, when Mr. Knowles made that statement in the house we had already passed in this house a motion to adjourn to Monday evening at 8 o'clock. So there was nothing we could do at that time. As the leader mentioned earlier this afternoon, some of us were already on the way home when Mr. Knowles stood up in the House of Commons and made that statement.

Senator Lafond, for Senator Forsey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented the following report:

Thursday, November 16, 1978

The Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments presents its first report, as follows:

Your committee recommends that its quorum be fixed at seven (7) members, provided that both Houses are represented, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings and receive evidence so long as four (4) members are present, provided that both Houses are represented;

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, this routine report, and the second report of the committee, which I shall be presenting on behalf of Senator Forsey, is required in order that the committee can commence functioning on Thursday. I would therefore move that consideration be given at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Thursday, November 16, 1978

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Second Report as follows:

Your committee submits again the criteria it will use for the review and scrutiny of statutory instruments:

Whether any regulation or other statutory instrument within its terms of reference, in the judgment of the committee:

(5) trespasses unduly on the rights and liberties of the subject;

(6) (a) tends directly or indirectly to exclude the jurisdiction of the courts without explicit authorization therefor in the enabling statute; or

(b) makes the rights and liberties of the subject dependent on administrative discretion rather than on the judicial process;

(8) appears for any reason to infringe the rule of law or the rule of natural justice;

(9) provides without good and sufficient reason that it shall come into force before registration by the Clerk of the Privy Council;

(10) in the absence of express authority to that effect in the enabling statute or prerogative, appears to amount to the exercise of a substantive legislative power properly the subject of direct parliamentary enactment, and not merely to the formulation of subordinate provisions of a technical or administrative character properly the subject of delegated legislation;

(11) without express provision to the effect having been made in the enabling statute or prerogative, imposes a fine, imprisonment or other penalty, or shifts the onus of proof of innocence to the person accused of an offence;

Senator Lafond moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL REVENUE

CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has any progress been made to enable us to obtain information on charitable institutions, especially those charitable institutions that receive special consideration for tax deduction purposes?

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, a similar question was asked in the other place this afternoon. As many honourable senators are aware, Mr. Chrétien mentioned in his budget that the list of charitable organizations should be made public. We would then be in a position to provide the information required.

As honourable senators are probably aware, we could not do that in the past because of section 241 covering secrecy in the Income Tax Act; but I believe that what was contained in the budget would allow us to provide the desired list.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SAFETY OF CANADIAN WORKERS IN IRAN—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have some replies to questions asked recently.

On November 16 Senator Marshall expressed concern regarding persons from Newfoundland who recently went to Iran to work in the pulp and paper industry.

Almost all Canadians who are employed on pulp and paper projects in Iran are located in the Caspian region. Our embassy in Tehran has had no reports of any Canadians there having been involved in any incidents threatening their safety.

Both major Canadian employers and the government are developing contingency plans to safeguard Canadians in the event of being adverse future developments.

[Senator Lafond.]

LABOUR

NUMBER OF STRIKES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: On November 16 Senator Grosart asked, as a supplementary question, if the government would provide the Senate with the latest comparative figures of the OECD and the International Labour Office. It was a supplementary to the Acting Leader of the Government's reply to Senator Walker's question on strikes in industrialized countries.

I should like to provide the house with some statistics on the number of disputes, the number of workers involved in disputes, and workers involved in disputes as a per cent of paid workers in 12 major OECD countries from 1970 to 1976. In so doing, it should be pointed out that these statistics indicate that in terms of the number of work stoppages and the number of workers involved in work stoppages in relation to paid workers, Canada ranks seventh in comparison with the 11 other major industrialized countries for most of this period. Although a relatively greater number of workers were affected by disputes in Canada in 1976, it is worth reiterating remarks made on behalf of the government last Thursday regarding the overall improvement in Canada's strike record. The evidence indicates that the number of disputes in 1977 dropped 23 per cent, and the number of workers involved dropped 86 per cent, and the number of workers involved relative to paid employees dropped to less than half of what it had been over the 1970 to 1976 period.

Honourable senators, there is a detailed table appended to this reply. With leave of the Senate, may I propose that it be printed in Hansard?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For table see appendix, p. 233)

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CLOSURE OF WEATHER STATIONS IN NEWFOUNDLAND AND REGINA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on October 24 Senator Steuart asked a question regarding the closure of weather stations in Newfoundland and Regina.

The decision to cancel the proposed cutback in the Gander weather office reflected the importance of accuracy and timeliness of weather information provided in support of our coastal and offshore fisheries, particularly as we move into a new era of offshore ocean management and development in Canada. This gives us an obligation and responsibility for an area of ocean never before managed in this way.

● (1700)

It is for this same reason that the Minister of the Environment and the President of the Treasury Board recently announced that the timetable for phasing out the Canadian weathership program in the Pacific Ocean has been extended to permit an alternate meteorological sensing and recording system to be put in place.

There is no plan to close the Regina weather office.

The Regina weather office is responsible for the preparation of forecasts for Saskatchewan, while the Winnipeg weather office is responsible for Manitoba and western Ontario.

What the government is proposing is to add Saskatchewan to the area of responsibility of the Winnipeg office, and to undertake the preparation of forecasts for Saskatchewan from Winnipeg. This proposed change will, we believe, in no way affect the services now provided to the people of Saskatchewan. Advances in technology—satellites, electronic data processing, automated high-speed communications—make it a scientifically sound move. It allows for greater efficiency in weather forecast operations and frees resources which are redirected to satisfy demands for new services.

The program of aviation forecasts will in no way be affected.

Full weather interpretation will continue to be provided at Regina.

A continuous watch over the weather elements will be maintained by both the Regina and the Winnipeg staffs so that timely forecast updates and warnings can be issued.

Finally, professional consultation with a meteorologist will still be available at the Prairie Hydrometeorological Centre in Regina, and at the Saskatoon weather office.

[Later:]

Senator Marshall: In the reply the Leader of the Government gave with regard to the closing of the weather stations, it appeared to me, if I grasped his answer properly, that there was a definitive expression that the Regina centre would not be closed, but on the other hand, in his reply with regard to the Gander office, he said that the closing of such an office would be extended. Does this mean that there will be an extension only until certain other incidents take place, or is there a definitive decision that the office will not be closed, in order to satisfy the need for weather information on the part of the fisheries in Newfoundland?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the information which I have provided was given to the house verbatim, as received from the office of the minister, and I am not in a position to comment further. I do not have information beyond what was given to me. If Senator Marshall would like to develop a supplementary question, however, I shall certainly seek the information.

FISHERIES

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH SEPARATE DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on October 24, 1978, Senator Marshall asked a question concerning Bill C-65. His question was as follows:

Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Honourable the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question concerning Bill C-65, entitled the Government Organization Act, 1978, part I of which deals with the establishment of a separate department of fisheries and oceans. Could the honourable leader impress upon the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment the importance of establishing such a department, and can the leader obtain from the minister information as to the date that this legislation might be re-introduced in the present session?

I have been in contact with the office of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, and I can advise honourable senators that the government intends to re-introduce legislation dealing with the department of fisheries at an appropriate time this session.

Senator Forsey: And under an appropriate title, I hope.

Senator Marshall: I wonder if the Leader of the Government would indicate the reasons for the fact that there is a department now with signs exposed referring to the "Department of Fisheries and Oceans." Can that be done without legislation being passed? It is not that I object to it, but is there any reason for the indication that such a department is already in existence?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only take the question as notice. The suggestion seems to be that the sign painting division is somewhat ahead of the parliamentary process.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if he thinks that the sign painting division should take it upon itself to legislate in advance of Parliament? I rise on this particular point because I think it is a pity that this offensive name should be given publicity in this fashion before Parliament has decided on it. For the life of me I cannot see why the old name of this department, or a similar department, which existed from 1868 to 1926, should not be revived, namely, that of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. It covers the same domain, you might say, but it does not have this ridiculous, preposterous sound of laying claim to the seven seas and all the oceans of the planet.

I think it is a great pity, and I venture to suggest to the Leader of the Government that it is a great pity, that the sign painting department should get ahead of itself and ahead of Parliament in this way. It may find that it has to destroy a lot of signs, and paint new ones. This assumption that because the government has made up its mind about something, therefore Parliament will certainly pass it is, I think, a very dangerous one. I have not forgotten the behaviour of the government over the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, at the time when I first came into this chamber.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if these signs are blossoming forth across the country, I offer my personal opinion that it is wrong for any government sign painting division to anticipate the actions of Parliament.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Stanley Haidasz moved the second reading of Bill C-5, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am happy to be able to speak to Bill C-5, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act.

This bill, after first reading on October 16, 1978 in the House of Commons, finally received all-party approval in that house only last Thursday, November 16. Another example of improvements in social welfare legislation, Bill C-5, proposed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, is of vital importance at this time, for reasons that members of this chamber are very much aware of.

The greatest statement this legislation makes is the expression to the older individuals of this country of our deep concern for their needs. Even in a time of economic restraint we are showing that we are aware of the plight of those older Canadians who are most affected by inflation. The increase in the guaranteed income supplement tells our senior citizens in no uncertain terms that there is a real commitment to their needs, and that proposals to fight inflation on the backs of those on fixed incomes will not see the light of day in the Parliament of Canada. If cutbacks are to be made, or improvements deferred, they will be made elsewhere.

Before I go any further on this particular bill I would like to put this whole area of benefits for older Canadians in perspective. In the early forties, as you will recall, assistance for the elderly consisted of the Old Age Pension Act, providing up to $20 per month at the age of 70 to long-term Canadian residents, subject to a means test, and on the basis of federal-provincial cost-sharing. The benefit was increased to $25 in 1943, to $30 in 1947 and to $40 in 1949. The big change came in 1951 when the current universal Old Age Security Act was introduced to provide $40 a month as a matter of right to persons in Canada who met the residence requirements. The improvement in benefits continued steadily over the years, but even as recently as 1966 the benefit available to senior Canadians was only $75 a month at the age of 70.

Happily, over the last 12 years, the picture has improved considerably. In 1966 the Canada Pension Plan was introduced providing retirement benefits for wage and salary earners. The guaranteed income supplement was introduced in 1967, and was very quickly made permanent to ensure a basic living standard for all needy Canadians.

As of October 1978, the basic old age security pension stands at $164.74 per month, and the maximum guaranteed income supplement is $115.55 per month for a single person or $102.61 for each spouse of a married couple. This assures a single person an income of $280.29 at age 65, while a married couple with one spouse over 65 and the other over 60 has access to a monthly income of up to $534.70 under the Old Age Security Act.

To qualify for the guaranteed income supplement, single, widowed or divorced pensioners must have an annual income under $2,784. Married pensioners, whose annual income is less than $4,944, will also qualify. A married couple with a single pension will be eligible if the income does not exceed $7,544.87.

[Senator Haidasz]

Although progress in this type of social legislation has been impressive in Canada, there is still room for the type of improvements made by Bill C-5.

What exactly does this bill do? First of all, it increases the level of guaranteed income supplement benefits available. This supplement, as you know, is the income-tested benefit available to old age security pensioners with little or no other income.

Approximately 60 per cent of old age security pensioners in this country rely to a greater or lesser extent on the guaranteed income supplement for their income needs. The proposed increase of $20 per month per household provided in this bill will take place automatically in January 1979 for everyone now receiving all or even just a part of the maximum guaranteed income supplement. Furthermore, some 100,000 people who previously had slightly too much income to qualify for the supplement will now be able to receive some additional monthly income as a result of these amendments.

How much is the increase in the supplement? Every household now receiving a guaranteed income supplement, full or partial, will receive an additional $20 each and every month. That is, where there is only one person receiving the GIS, that person's cheque will be $20 higher per month. Where both spouses of a marriage are receiving the GIS, each one will receive an extra $10 for a total of $20. Not only that but the amount of the increase will be indexed in the regular way every calendar quarter to ensure that purchasing power is maintained.

Honourable senators will note that a relatively larger increase in benefits is being given to single pensioners than to married couples. This is a deliberate move to continue the efforts begun in 1970 to provide both single and married pensioners with sufficient income to meet their basic needs. With this increase, even if they have no income aside from the old age pension and the GIS, a pensioner couple will finally reach the Statistics Canada poverty line which, at the present time, is $4,212 per year for a single person, and $6,107 per year for a couple.

Unfortunately, we cannot yet say the same for single pensioners. It is generally agreed that a single person cannot meet basic expenses on half the income of a couple. In fact, a single person needs about 60 per cent of a couple's income to get by. Even with this increase weighted in favour of the single pensioner—and so many of our pensioners are single—the benefits available to a person alone will be only 54 per cent of those available to a couple. Still, this does represent 80 per cent of the poverty income level, and is a positive step towards reaching the goal of real income security for those in need.

Let us not get too caught up in the GIS increase because this is only the first of the two improvements brought about by this bill.

The second part of Bill C-5 is the extension of spouse's allowance for six months in the event of the death of the other OAS pensioner spouse. The spouse's allowance program provides an income-tested benefit to the 60 to 65-year-old spouse of an OAS pensioner. It was introduced to relieve the problems faced by couples already connected to the OAS program but who are finding it difficult to make do on a single pension.

This new provision will affect only a fraction of the number of people touched by the first proposal. Some 200 allowance recipients are currently removed from the benefit lists every month as a result of the death of their pensioner spouses.

In terms of importance to the individual, however, this amendment will provide much needed transitional support and security. Up till now, because of the nature of the spouse's allowance program which was to relieve only the specific difficulties faced by an older couple having to live on one pension and supplement, when the OAS pensioner died, the survivor, usually a widow, turned to other welfare programs for alternative ways of meeting her financial needs. The problem which arose as a result of the loss of the spouse's allowance was immediate and occurred at a time of severe emotional stress. Therefore, it was very hard on the widowed spouse to make the necessary financial arrangements.

This provision will provide a six-months' benefit extension—a transitional period or a bridge, if you will—during which the spouse can apply for and receive a Canada Pension Plan benefit, settle her estate, claim insurance income or possibly even sell a house and move into other accommodation. It will also provide an opportunity to make application for federally cost-shared provincial welfare programs. For some, a six-months' extension will take them right up to their sixty-fifth birthday and access to old age security benefits in their own right.

The amount of the allowance will remain basically unchanged during this six-months' extension except that it will be increased each quarter to compensate for rises in the Consumer Price Index. There will be no need to make special application for the extension. It will be paid automatically.

One final point: Because the amount of a spouse's allowance is tied to the amount of the guaranteed income supplement, all recipients of spouse's allowance and their OAS pensioner spouses will receive the additional $10 per month beginning on January 1, 1979.

On the question of effective date, it is vital for us to remember that although the increase in GIS would come into effect on January 1, 1979, the spouse's allowance extension will apply to anyone widowed immediately after the bill receives royal assent. We must remember that there is no retroactivity clause in this bill.

● (1720)

As I said previously, some 200 allowance recipients are widowed each month. This means that every day approximately seven people face the loss of this benefit, and each extra day this bill is discussed results in the irrevocable loss of the benefit extension for these people.

Honourable senators, this description of the legislation has been brief, but I feel it captures the essence of the provisions. As responsible legislators, however, we all know that any bill of this type has effects that are not apparent from reading the legislation itself.

What of the cost of these amendments and the effect on the economy? The GIS increase will cost approximately $290 million in the fiscal year 1979-80. This may seem like a lot of money, and indeed it is. But we must remember that this money will be distributed directly into the hands of some 1.3 million individuals. Not only that, but these are people very much in need of this money, people who will use the money to purchase more in the way of basic consumer goods. This is not a lost expenditure. This money will be helping producers and retailers and giving the economy of this country some of the stimulation it needs these days.

The cost of the spouses' allowance is far less intimidating. The additional six months of benefits will cost about $1.6 million in 1979 and $2.4 million in 1980.

May I add at this time, honourable senators, that the matter of pensions and a possible flexible retirement age in the future is now being thoroughly studied by a special committee of this house under the chairmanship of our distinguished colleague, Senator Croll. Furthermore, a Special Bureau of the Problems for the Aged has already been established in the Department of National Health and Welfare.

I would also add that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is at this time in Toronto meeting with her welfare colleagues from all the provinces, hoping that she will be able to get their co-operation in passing this increase on to the pensioner—that is, that no corresponding reduction will be made in the provincial supplements.

Honourable senators, I am convinced that these measures, and specifically the provisions of Bill C-5, are worthwhile improvements. In the weeks to come we will be seeing other parts of an entire package of proposals to realign social programs in Canada in order to provide more money where it is most needed. It is encouraging to see this kind of co-ordinated approach being taken to the development of social policy in Canada, and I urge all honourable senators to assist this process and, in particular, to give full support to and passage of this bill as soon as possible.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, in replying to my colleague, the honourable sponsor of Bill C-5, to amend the Old Age Security Act, I must say it is perfectly obvious that no one can quarrel with the two main provisions of the bill, but I do so with some qualification.

The first provision mentioned by Senator Haidasz is that there will be an increase of $20 per household, which is designed, as he explained, to cushion the effects of the rapid increases in the cost of living. The second provision, however, has got to be one that gives us cause for concern and wonderment. The reasoning by which they come up with the spouses' allowance regulations in the first place is baffling to me. I am referring to the spouse's allowance, whereby the spouse of an old age security recipient could qualify for benefits at age 60 if the other spouse were 65, which was a welcome amendment to the Old Age Security Act when it was introduced. For some strange reason, the drafters of the bill were not aware of the implications, whereby when the qualifying recipients dies, say at age 66 or 67, and the spouse is in the age bracket between 60 and 65, she or he would be cut off from the spouse's allowance and, left with no continuing support other than dependence on the welfare rolls of the province in which he or she resides.

Now, under Bill C-5, thankfully there is a partial recognition of that inequity, by allowing those spouses to adjust their future by granting a continuance of the old age security pension for six months.

That, too, honourable senators, is difficult for me to reconcile. The minister, in the first provision, grants an extra $20 per household with the justification, and the correct justification, that the cost of living of a single person is more than just half that of a couple. That is fine; I agree.

Then the next words of the minister are pertinent. She said that the cost of living of a single person is approximately two-thirds of that of a couple—and indeed provides for an increase of $20—and then contradicts that fact by ensuring that after six months of readjustment, the pensioner can revert to the welfare rolls. The minister went on to say that there is no way a single recipient can live as cheaply as two can live. I agree. Yet she can justify the limitation of the spouse's allowance to six months, and to allow them, without any consideration, to fall back into the single category of a widow or widower who has to face the shock of a reduction in her or his allowance after the expiration of those six months.

The minister also supports the justification for an increase to one pensioner of $20 per month in a household because again, as she correctly points out, a widow, for example, living in a one-bedroom apartment faces the same basic monthly cost of the telephone and hydro, but she does not mention such items as drugs, glasses or other needs, which are pertinent.

At the present moment, two old age security recipients, thank God, are in receipt of a maximum of $534.70 a month, and on January 1, 1979, this will be increased by $20 and be indexed quarterly. If both are over 65 and one unfortunately dies, the one remaining is still entitled to $280.29 and, living in a household, he or she also qualifies for the $20 increase. Yet, honourable senators, in taking the example of one over 65 and the other over 64, who together are entitled to the same $534.70, if the spouse over 65 dies the remaining spouse, after the period of six months, not only loses the $20 cushion that the minister says they need together or separately, but loses also most of the $280.29 and has still to fall back on the mercy of the provincial government for welfare.

Honourable senators, I don't know what the figures are in all the provinces, but I do know that in Newfoundland a widow living in her own home is entitled to only $201. I can only repeat that the minister contradicts herself with inconsistencies when, on the one hand, she says that one old age security recipient widow needs $300.29, but a widow who is 64½ years of age, for example, requires almost $100 less, and on the other hand, she says that a single person requires two-thirds of a couple's income. That particular widow has to wish away her life by looking forward to the day she is 65 years of age.

● (1730)

The other inconsistency which raises its ugly head is the fact that this bill is not consistent with other legislation of the Government of Canada. I would like to recommend to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that she look at the legislation that affects veterans. Under the War Veterans Allowance Act, a married couple receives $534.29, and the war veterans allowance recipient is a person who has aged prematurely by serving in war. On the death of one of the recipients, the other continues to get the married rate of over $500 for a year. After the year, the single recipient, the spouse, regardless of age, continues to receive the single rate for the rest of his or her life. So, it is very difficult to understand these inconsistencies that appear, and yet the minister can justify allowing, after only six months, the spouse to live on a greatly reduced pension.

At the same time I agree that we have to take these things step by step, and I understand that the cost, if they were to allow the spouse of an old age security pensioner to continue to receive the benefits, would be $630 million. As we used to say in the Veterans Affairs Committee, "We will accept anything that is good, and we will fight the battle for more another day."

I can understand as well the reasoning of the minister when she indicates that if the pension to a widow of an old age pension recipient were allowed to continue, it would be contrary to what is allowed to other single citizens aged 60 to 65. I can only say that I was hoping she would introduce something along the lines recommended by her predecessor, namely, that all those between the ages of 55 and 64, and in receipt of the guaranteed income supplement, should receive $90 a month to help with the cost of living and to cushion the effects of inflation and other things.

In any case, I can only repeat that we will accept whatever we can get for the old age pensioners, because they deserve it. I must commend the minister because she is certainly concerned. I have read all the speeches she has made across the country. I recognize that it is easy to criticize, and I also recognize the vast cost. I hope that the increases that we are going to see through this bill will be of benefit to those old age citizens who need it, and I can only recommend that we pass the bill as soon as possible so that the payments can be made.

As was said earlier this afternoon, it is unfortunate that there was not more co-operation to show the concern of all members of Parliament, in both this chamber and the other house, for our old age citizens and their spouses. This bill must be passed as quickly as possible so that they can receive these badly needed benefits.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I cannot resist the temptation to speak. I have left all my notes upstairs, so you are safe.

Senator Flynn: You don't need them.

Senator Croll: This bill is progress. It's timely; it's necessary and it's welcome. That is about all you can say about the bill and there is no more that needs to be said. Some will say that the amount of money is not fair. It never was—it was never enough for both sides of the house, anyway.

When you talk of old age security and old age pension, I am an original. In 1925, when I came out of school to practise law, the Senate of that day rejected a pension bill that had been passed by the House of Commons—$20 a month at 70 years of age, with a means test. I was something of a rebel in those days. I went out immediately and participated in the election of 1930, and the government was re-elected.

Senator Flynn: You are mixed up.

Senator Croll: The old age pension bill was then brought before the Senate, and the Senate, in its wisdom, passed it.

Not only did the old people benefit from it, but so did persons who were secretaries of political organizations. I remember that I was secretary of the Liberal association in the riding, and I had to take care of the organization and provide the speakers. On many occasions the word came back that Joe Smith could not make a speaking engagement at such and such a place. I would try to get somebody else, and if I could not find anybody I went and made the speech myself. I did that so often that I became well known, and two years later I was elected mayor of Windsor. That was my start in office. It benefited me.

We went along with advocating more money in those days because money was the most important thing. A rather interesting thing that is not generally known is that for seven years after the old age pension legislation was passed Quebec would not accept it. When I first heard about it, I said, "What are they talking about?" They said it was the duty of the family to look after the old, and not the duty of the state. If not appreciated, it was an admirable approach.

Senator Flynn: Now it is the duty only of the state.

Senator Croll: I remember that when Duplessis agreed to accept the old age pension, he wanted retroactive payments made for the time the act was ignored. I don't think he got them. We went along and, of course, tried our best to improve the legislation, but the atmosphere was not there. I don't remember the amount, but I think it went to $65.

After the war half the members of the House of Commons were veterans. We drew up a veterans' charter that was the best anywhere in terms of its benefits and the commitments it made to veterans. We did this for the veterans, keeping in mind what we did not do for the veterans of World War I—and I will come back to that.

Then in 1952 the pressure was on, and the government agreed to appoint a committee. It was a joint committee chaired by Jean Lesage. The committee, in turn, appointed a subcommittee, of which I was a member. The question with which we were faced at that time was whether we should go along with what the Americans were doing and establish a social security system, or whether we should establish the old age security pension and add to it at a later date.

The pension at the time was $40 a month, and we as a committee wanted that increased to $50. In addition, we wanted universality. The St. Laurent government took the position that they would agree to universality and a pension of $40 a month if we had unanimous agreement of the committee, and to that end we had to win over the CCF and Conservative members of the committee. The subcommittee came back and agreed to accept that. We wanted a pension of $50 a month, but we agreed to accept a pension of $40 a month with universality.

The gross national product at that time was $25 billion a year, and we were told that as the gross national product increased, the pension would increase. Well, it has not quite worked out that way. The gross national product at this particular time is $235 billion, and all we are getting is $167, which is a little more than four times $40, as against nine times $40. Nevertheless, that was the purpose and the objective.

The fact that the pension was payable as of right represented great progress—but we had trouble selling it to our senior citizens. I can recall my father saying to me that he had not brought four boys into this world to have them put him on welfare. He refused to take the pension, as did thousands of others across the country. In an effort to get the people to accept the pension, we got Mr. St. Laurent to make a public statement saying that he was accepting it; that it was right to do so. That solved our problem.

As my friend Senator Marshall indicated, we continued to improve veterans' pensions. During this time there was pressure on us. This was a time when the two-family home was beginning to disappear. The children were moving to the suburbs. They were willing to be taxed in order to pay for these programs. The general view was, "We are not complaining about being taxed. Look after those old folks."

Senator Flynn: I never heard anything like that.

Senator Croll: We did tax them, but we were still not providing enough; there was need for more. Then we in this house appointed a Committee on Aging, which for three years studied the question of aging. Some who were members of that committee are still sitting in this house. That committee brought in some 90 recommendations, one of which was that the age for old age security be reduced progressively year by year, and that a supplement be paid. Many of the committee's recommendations were accepted. That, too, represented a matter of considerable progress. Through that committee, the people became aware that we were interested and concerned; that we understood their problems, and that we were not treating them as though they were orphans in a storm. Somebody took a special interest in these people, and they knew it. As a result, something good came of it. These people were able to continue on a scale that more adequately met their needs.

Then, of course, we continued with the study, the vehicle this time being the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. It, again, was a great contribution on the part of the Senate.

In all cases, the timing seemed to be just right. People were concerned. They were interested. Our study revealed that there were many people who were in need and did not admit it. These people got along the best they could. From that study we learned of the working poor—some 750,000 people in this country who were working for less money than they could have received on relief. This was at a time when we were hearing about the “bums on welfare”—and all because a small percentage abused the system. Those suffering the most were those in the 50 to 55 age group.

● (1750)

We found great poverty, particularly among women because they lived longer. When a widower remarried, he married a younger woman and she would live longer. These women did not have the experience that men had. They did not even get part of the pension plan. And their suffering is still evident at the present time, and is likely to continue unless we do something about it.

What this bill does is good, but let me just tell you what my own views are, because I think that perhaps we are making the same basic mistakes that we have already made in the past in this country.

Senator Marshall: They have been made by the Liberals.

Senator Croll: The trouble is that you have not been in office long enough to make mistakes.

Let me take you back a few years, because most of you are old enough to know what I am talking about. I will take you back to World War I. You will remember that when the soldiers returned there was little provision made for them, and they broke up into groups. There was no Canadian Legion at that time, but about half a dozen groups existed in the country. I remember them well, because they applied for help to municipalities, and I was connected with municipalities at that time. Those groups fought among themselves until 1926, I think, when legislation was finally passed through which they were brought together to form the Canadian Legion. It was not until then that anything of value came to them. That is a point I should really like to stress.

In those days the veterans affairs department was called the Department of Pensions and National Health, I believe, and if you had been here in those days you would have known the veterans' animosity.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I call your attention to the fact that it is now 6 o'clock. I suggest that we return at 8 o'clock.

Senator Croll: Did you say it is 6 o'clock?

Senator Flynn: Yes, that is true. You will have a chance to get your notes together in the meantime.

Senator Croll: Thank you very much.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps it will avoid a few repetitions.

[Senator Croll.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 12, it being 6 o'clock I now leave the Chair until 8 o'clock.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Senator Croll: When we adjourned, I was reminding the house that we went through a similar situation at another time. There were a great many people who had much in common but who were completely without effect. Of course, as I indicated, the veterans department came under another ministry. The only way that change was brought about was by the veterans becoming belligerent and entering the political field. The veterans wanted recognition, and they got it.

We call to mind Ian Mackenzie, Bobby Lapointe, Milton Gregg and Alf Brooks. They were great men who devoted themselves to the cause of veterans and brought about better conditions for them. They did not take anything away from anyone else because, as those honourable senators who were close to the then government know, when the veterans received an increase, benefits were given also to other people, in order that they might not be left out.

What we cannot seem to get across to our older people is that politics represents power. Elderly people represent 8 per cent of our population, of which 17 per cent are in Ontario and 12 per cent in British Columbia. That figure of 8 per cent is growing, and it represents a great power if only elderly people would take advantage of it. All they have to do is to feel concerned, and get out and vote.

Senator Flynn: They always vote the same way.

Senator Croll: No, they do not. I do not recall meeting any politician who felt unsympathetic toward the cause of the elderly. Some political parties have had the opportunity of demonstrating their sympathies more effectively and sooner than others. Some give the matter a high priority, and, after all, it is a question of priorities.

Senator Flynn has been in Ottawa almost as long as I have, and knows that this is a place of special interests. There are more lobbyists here than there are members of Parliament. Everyone is trying to sell his particular cause. Elderly people should have an opportunity to plead their cause with their member of Parliament, their member of the legislature or alderman, all of whom can help. However, they feel that politics is not for them, but they will have to learn as others had to learn.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Croll: Elderly people represent a power. As I have said, the veterans were treated fairly and with equality. It is difficult to justify having a ministry of sports but not a ministry for the elderly. Labour has a ministry, as has business and the fishing industry, and all those ministries exist for the purpose of looking after the causes of special groups. Someone should have responsibility in Parliament for the elderly; there should be someone who should have to answer to Parliament for that group of people.

What we are doing today is patching, and next week, with Bill C-7, we will be doing some more patching. We keep doing a little of that here and a little there, and keep on saying, "Well, we cannot afford it." If we added up all the sums we find in that way, however, we would see that we can very well afford it. We have to move towards reducing the age from 65 to 60, little by little.

Senator Flynn: Until when?

Senator Croll: There are half a million people at the present time—300,000 women and 200,000 men—who are really suffering. These people are really in need, and we are going to have to do something for them. This applies particularly to the women, whom we sometimes refer to as the four D's—that is, divorced, diseased, disabled and deserted. These people are constantly in need, and until we reduce the age we are not going to be able to look after them. I have suggested that we should have a ministry to deal with this subject. This would not involve the spending of a great deal of money, and there are a lot of candidates for ministers sitting over there—

Senator Flynn: No doubt!

Senator Croll: —who can do a first class job.

There is work for such a ministry to do. When I say that, I in no way detract from the achievements of the present Minister of National Health and Welfare. She has done a remarkably good job of selling the idea of spending the kind of money we need to spend at the present time. However, we need, in addition, someone who would make this specific matter a priority, and his or her immediate task.

Once you give something some attention, it is amazing how it grows. Take, for instance, one of the budget papers, entitled "Integration of Social Payments into the Income Tax System." This is a discussion paper on the feasibility of integration. I do not suggest that the paper agrees with everything that the Special Senate Committee on Poverty suggested in its report, but the finance minister mentioned it in his budget speech. All we were suggesting in our report is that the various shared programs between the provinces and the dominion be integrated into one. I have been doing some research, and I find that in Canada today we have 112 shared programs as between the provinces and the dominion. That is a fair number of programs to have, and the suggestion was made that we could cut down that number considerably. That is what is being discussed in this paper.

The other thing that the Senate committee talked about in its report was the poverty line. The indication was that the government was trying to meet the poverty line as laid down by Statistics Canada. Statistics Canada, of course, knows what it is talking about, but we on the Poverty Committee also drew a poverty line when we first presented our report in 1974. This has since been accepted by the Canadian Council on Social Development, and generally throughout the country. The poverty line contained in our report is higher than that contained in the Statistics Canada report because that report made provision for rural areas whereas our report did not. However, there is not much difference between us.

● (2010)

Using Statistics Canada information as a basis, we were able to work out what a family of four required financially, and then we tried to fix a poverty line. It is amazing how close our figures came to those arrived at by other groups.

I realize that at this particular time there is not too much money available, but we can do something. While studies were being made in the Senate, there was always hope in the minds of Canadians that somebody was looking after their problems and trying to make some sense out of them. We owe some assistance to these elderly people who find themselves in difficult positions because their money is not worth what they expected it would be worth. For those who have left the work force, it is difficult to return.

There is great need for a special study. If we cannot give these elderly people money, we can give them hope. They will know that we are looking into their problems, and they can hope that sooner or later something helpful to them will come of our study. We can only hope that this will be soon.

I have indicated that I am in support of the bill. We, in the Senate, not only understand bills of this sort; we have contributed a great deal to them, and we will contribute to them in the future as we have in the past.

The government should not be stubborn about establishing a ministry for the aged, or establishing a poverty line that is meaningful. I would also suggest that the government should make a move at this time towards reducing the pensionable age from 65 to 60. People will agree that we cannot afford to do this immediately, but at the same time they realize that we at least ought to be involving ourselves in this question. All of my suggestions are feasible and would carry the approval of the people. I support the bill.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak at any length on this bill, but there are one or two comments I should like to make.

As has been mentioned, the bill does two things, and in my opinion both are good. The additional $20 a month payable across the board to those households receiving the guaranteed income supplement is, I think, more than welcome. This $20 will not make anybody rich but it will be helpful, and these people certainly need to be helped.

I particularly like the idea that it is a straight increase and that no means test or income test is to be used in connection with it. I do not know just why the amount of $20 a month was selected. Indeed, I think there is no guiding principle behind it.

I must say that I like the down-to-earth approach of the minister to the bill and to the amount. She said:

This is not a bill that has behind it a principle or establishes one . . . It addresses in a pragmatic way a set of circumstances which created such hardship to so many people that the bill was due for improvement.

Honourable senators, the bill is attempting to deal in a down-to-earth manner with the serious financial difficulties of many of those who receive the guaranteed income supplement. It is not a solution to their problems, but it is an improvement over their present situation.

It may be argued that the bill does not treat single people and married couples in the same manner. The single person will receive $20 a month and a married couple will receive $20 a month between them. However, I do not think there can be any serious objection to this. Indeed, quite the contrary. I notice that in the debate in the other place the minister mentioned that the cost of living of the single person was about two-thirds that of a married couple, and this being so the discrimination does in fact exist against the single person. The maximum supplement for October for a married couple was $205.22, and for a single person it was $115.59, so if we are to be fair about it the maximum supplement for the single person should be more. It should, in fact, be $136 and some cents. Of course, I am not for a moment suggesting that the $205.22 is adequate, or that it will be adequate with the $20 a month increase. I should like to see the increase raised to more than $20, but I can appreciate the difficulty of obtaining a higher increase at this time.

What is disturbing is the fact that so many people qualify for and need the supplement in whole or in part. Indeed, I think they all need the maximum, but under the income means test all cannot receive it. This bill will be helpful in this regard, as it will automatically raise the income ceiling and so make an additional 100,000 people eligible to receive the supplement in whole or in part.

I do not know just how many people receive the maximum supplement, but I notice that 60 per cent of all pensioners will benefit from this legislation, which means that 1,350,000 people receive the supplement in whole or in part. These figures tell a sad story. It is a dreadful commentary and a shocking indictment of our society that so many people have so little income. More frightful still is the fact that, according to the minister, some 800,000 women in Canada are old, are poor and live alone.

So, honourable senators, it is obvious we still have a long way to go before we can be satisfied with our social security system; yet, perhaps we should not overlook the fact that there are some bright spots and some encouraging features in our present system. I know that the joint federal-provincial project, known as the Senior Citizens Housing, is most successful. It is an effective and satisfactory manner of assisting senior citizens. I am only familiar with its operation in Nova Scotia, and, indeed, that part of Nova Scotia in which I reside. I know that it provides good accommodation and reasonable rental to those who qualify. I understand that the building of such accommodation cannot keep up with the demand and need for it. I do not think the same commendation can be given to the homes for the aged, community homes, old age homes and the like. They have a boarding house atmosphere. They provide nursing care as well as accommodation for elderly persons.

[Senator Macdonald.]

The care and accommodation is excellent, but the price is too high for the ordinary pensioner. Of course, I do not know the prices charged in all places. I do know that the price charged in my area of Nova Scotia—between $800 and $900 a month—is exorbitant and beyond the means of the ordinary pensioner. It means that any savings a person has accumulated over a lifetime, and any other assets he may have, will be used to pay his way until it is all used up, and then welfare comes into the picture.

It is sad for people who have taken pride in paying their own way throughout their lifetime to now have to accept welfare. Like it or not, welfare has a stigma attached to it for them. That attitude may be wrong. I know it is not the general attitude of the present day, but it is their attitude and I think these people should be able to live out their lives with dignity and pride, without having to feel they are under any obligation to anyone.

I know that it costs money to build and operate these homes, which provide a real need. I think they should be directly subsidized by all three levels of government, rather than being indirectly subsidized, as they are now, by welfare payments. This would prevent those who occupy these homes from having to use up assets they may have acquired through years of hard work and savings.

If a person owns a home and sells it while welfare has paid part of his or her accommodation, then welfare is repaid from such sale and the person can only keep up to $1,000 of the assets—enough to provide a modest funeral. People should not have to become paupers in their final years. I must admit I do not know if direct subsidies by three levels of government is the answer, but I should like to see it tried. I know that welfare officers would also welcome some new system. The ones I know are dedicated, compassionate people who are anxious to assist the elderly in any way they can. They hate to have to inform anyone that he cannot retain the proceeds from the sale of a home or other assets.

Honourable senators, I have wandered from the provisions of the bill before us. I think, indeed, the previous two speakers have done the same. I shall make but a brief reference to the second part of the bill. I also strongly support the idea of paying the surviving spouse the spouse's allowance for six months after the date of death. Strong and convincing arguments can be advanced for the payment of pensions to all needy persons over 60 and under 65 years of age. I suppose it is discriminatory to pay an allowance to a spouse and not to a single person whose needs may be greater. However, such allowance will, I trust, come in the future. This bill deals with continuing such payments for six months. Why six months was chosen is not clear. I expect it was also a down-to-earth approach to a specific problem. It is an improvement over existing legislation and, as such, deserves support.

It has been said that this improvement in pensions is going to cost in the neighbourhood of $300 million. It is also said that no additional taxation is going to be imposed to meet that cost. It is to be absorbed into the government budget. That can only mean one of two things: it is either going to be part of the deficit, or other programs are going to be reduced in order to free funds for this measure. I should like to know what other programs are going to be reduced, but I am afraid to ask.

To repeat, I am shocked that the House of Commons took a month to process this legislation. When it was introduced, I certainly expected, as did many others, that it would come into force at the end of October. But the other place dillydallied about the thing, and because they did not then do the right thing and make it retroactive to at least November 1, many people who would have otherwise qualified do not qualify.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, in view of the many views expressed in support of Bill C-5, I would move, with leave, that the bill be read the third time now.

Senator Flynn: I would suggest that the bill be referred to either a Committee of the Whole or to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Senator Haidasz: In that case, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the Senate adjourns during pleasure, I should like to announce that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science will meet to consider the bill in room 356-S when the Senate rises.

I propose that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 9.40 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator McGrand, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, presented the following report:

Monday, November 20, 1978

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, to which was referred Bill C-5, "An Act to amend the Old Age Security Act", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Monday, November 20, 1978, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

The committee nevertheless strongly recommends that the Government consider the advisability of introducing at the earliest possible opportunity an amendment to this bill that would have the effect of making clause 2 of the bill retroactive to November 1, 1978.

Respectfully submitted,

F. A. McGrand,
Deputy Chairman.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I just want to put on the record the fact that the committee's recommendation that the government introduce legislation without delay to make clause 2 retroactive to November 1 is made to redeem the reputation of the Commons, which delayed this legislation for about a month, during which time, according to Mr. Knowles, it deprived over 200 spouses of the benefit of clause 2. The Senate has the responsibility for about 28; they have the responsibility for 210.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PARLIAMENT

MESSAGES BETWEEN HOUSES—POINT OF ORDER

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order which Your Honour may take under advisement, because it is a mixed question of facts and our rules or customs. It is in connection with Bill C-5, which we adopted yesterday following presentation of the report of the committee that the bill be passed without amendment. The report stated that:

The committee nevertheless strongly recommends that the Government consider the advisability of introducing at the earliest possible opportunity an amendment to this bill that would have the effect of making clause 2 of the bill retroactive to November 1, 1978.

Of course, the bill was read for the third time and passed, and the message was sent to the other place.

It does not show here in our Hansard, and it does not appear in print in the other place, that the message mentioned the recommendation. I do not know whether that is in accordance with our custom and usage, and I doubt whether it is provided for in our rules. When the Senate passes a bill in the form in which it comes to us from the other place but with a recommendation that something be done in respect of that measure, the other place should be so informed. Hansard of the other place does not show that they were informed of the Senate's recommendation in respect of Bill C-5. Also, I have been told that they did not hear that part of the report of the committee. That is a question of fact which Your Honour may verify.

The other question, of course, is whether, assuming the facts are as I suspect, the message to the other place should not include the recommendation of the Senate. After all, if the members of the other place are not informed of such recommendations, they would simply think we had merely submitted to the circumstances which we spoke of yesterday.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is certainly no disagreement with the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition. The matter is one which should be investigated and a method found to make certain that messages with their recommendations are transmitted to the other place in the form intended by honourable senators.

CANADA NON-PROFIT CORPORATIONS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Wednesday, November 8, 1978

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred Bill S-4, intituled: "An Act respecting Canadian non-profit corporations", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of November 2, 1978, examined the said bill and now reports as follows:

The predecessor of Bill S-4 was Bill S-3. Bill S-3 was introduced in the Senate during the third session of Parliament and was referred to your committee for examination on November 22, 1977. Your committee held six meetings on Bill S-3, heard twenty witnesses and reported the bill to the Senate on March 16, 1978, with 73 amendments. The bill, as amended by your committee, was passed by the Senate on March 22, 1978, and sent to the House of Commons. The bill did not progress beyond first reading in the House of Commons and, as a result, it died on the order paper when the third session of Parliament was prorogued on October 10, 1978.

A revised version of Bill S-3 was introduced in the Senate on October 17, 1978, and was designated as Bill S-4. Included in Bill S-4 were the 73 amendments made by the Senate to Bill S-3 and certain other changes made to the text of Bill S-3 by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs when it revised the bill prior to its reintroduction in the present session of Parliament. Your committee is satisfied that these changes, which are set out in the appendix to the proceedings of your committee of November 8, 1978 (Issue No. 2), were made in the public interest and will assist in the proper administration of the Act.

Your committee has also given careful study to certain amendments to Bill S-4 prepared by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and proposed in committee. Your committee is satisfied that these amendments are in order.

Your committee, therefore, recommends that Bill S-4 be amended as follows:

1. Page 2, Subsection 2(1): In the French version only, strike out line 44 and substitute the following:

"la Loi sur les corporations commerciales"

2. Page 8, Subclause 5(1): Strike out line 11 and substitute the following:

7. Page 76, Subsection 124(1): In the French version only, strike out line 8 and substitute the following:

Respectfully submitted,

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Wednesday, November 8, 1978

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred Bill S-5, intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of November 1, 1978, examined the said bill and now reports as follows:

The predecessor of Bill S-5 was Bill S-2. Bill S-2 was introduced in the Senate during the third session of Parliament on November 15, 1977. Your committee held seven meetings on Bill S-2, heard nine witnesses and reported the bill to the Senate on March 15, 1978, with 100 amendments. The bill, as amended by your committee, was passed by the Senate on March 20, 1978, and sent to the House of Commons. The bill did not progress beyond first reading in the House of Commons and, as a result, it died on the order paper when the third session of Parliament was prorogued on October 10, 1978.

A revised version of Bill S-2 was introduced in the Senate on October 17, 1978, and was designated as Bill S-5. Included in Bill S-5 were the 100 amendments made by the Senate to Bill S-2 and certain other changes made to the text of Bill S-2 by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs when it revised the bill prior to its re-introduction in the present session of Parliament. Your committee is satisfied that these changes, which are set out in the appendix to the Proceedings of your committee of November 8, 1978 (Issue No. 2), were made in the public interest and will assist in the proper administration of the Act.

Your committee has also given careful study to certain amendments to Bill S-5 prepared by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and proposed in committee. Your committee is satisfied that these amendments are in order.

Your committee, therefore, recommends that Bill S-5 be amended as follows:

1. Page 7, Subclause 11(1): Strike out lines 1 to 15 and substitute the following:

“(1.2) Notwithstanding subsection 25(3) and subsection (1.1), where, after November 8, 1977, a corporation issues shares

(a) in exchange for

(i) property of a person who immediately before the exchange does not deal with the corporation at arm's length within the meaning of that term in the Income Tax Act, or

(ii) shares of a body corporate that immediately before the exchange or that, because of the exchange, does not deal with the corporation at arm's length within the meaning of that term in the Income Tax Act, or

(b) pursuant to an agreement referred to in subsection 176(1) or an arrangement referred to in paragraph 185.1(1)(b) or (c) to shareholders of an amalgamating body corporate who receive the shares in addition to or instead of securities of the amalgamated body corporate,”

2. Page 7, Subclause 11(1): Strike out line 38 and substitute the following:

“must be approved by special resolution unless all the issued and outstanding shares are shares of not more than two classes of convertible shares referred to in subsection 37(4.1).”

3. Page 13, Clause 18: Add, immediately after subclause 18(1), the following Subclause:

“(1.1) The definition “bona fide purchaser” in subsection 44(2) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

“bona fide purchaser” means a purchaser for value in good faith and without notice of any adverse claim who takes delivery of a security in bearer form or order form or of a security in registered form issued to him or endorsed to him or endorsed in blank;”

4. Page 22, Subclause 30(2): Strike out line 5 and substitute the following:

“(4) If a record date is fixed, unless notice of the record date is waived in writing by every holder of a share of the class or series affected whose name is set out in the securities register at the close of business on the day the directors fix the record date, notice”

5. Page 23, Clause 41: In the French version only, strike out lines 9 to 11 and substitute the following:

“d'actions disposant de plus de cinquante pour cent des voix, sont présents ou représentés.”

“(e.1) reduce or increase its stated capital which,”

7. Page 28, New Clauses 56.1 and 56.2: Add immediately after clause 56 the following Clauses:

“56.1 Subsection 177(5) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

“(5) Subject to subsection (4), an amalgamation agreement is adopted when the shareholders of each amalgamating corporation have approved of the amalgamation by special resolutions.”

“56.2 (1) Subparagraph 178(1)(b)(ii) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

“(ii) except as may be prescribed, the articles of amalgamation shall be the same as the articles of incorporation of the amalgamated holding corporation, and”

(2) Subparagraph 178(2)(b)(ii) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

“(ii) except as may be prescribed, the articles of amalgamation shall be the same as the articles of incorporation of the amalgamating subsidiary corporation whose shares are not cancelled, and”

8. Page 39, Subclause 82(2): Strike out line 40 and substitute the following:

“cate referred to in subsection (2) or 256(2) may be”

Respectfully submitted,

SALTER A. HAYDEN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hayden moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Thursday, November 23, 1978, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WIDOWS OF VETERANS—PENSIONS—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he would consult with the Minister of Veterans Affairs to determine what progress is being made with regard to the inclusion of widows of veterans receiving disability pensions who are receiving a rate of less than 48 per cent. This matter has gone on for some time now, and I think we should receive a progress report because of the interest expressed in this chamber as well as in the other place.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, a determination will be made as to whether the information has yet been received.

FISHERIES

SIGNS INDICATING EXISTENCE OF DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Senator Marshall asked a question yesterday with respect to signs which he alleged are being “exposed” in the country referring to the “Department of Fisheries and Oceans”. The question was:

Can that be done without legislation being passed? It is not that I object to it, but is there any reason for the indication that such a department is already in existence?

“Fisheries and Oceans” is the applied title for the proposed Department of Fisheries and Oceans as opposed to being the legal title and, by regulation, is permitted to be used.

The use of applied names, I have been informed, is a common practice. “Parks Canada”, for example, is widely used although not a legal entity.

By letter of August 16 to the Honourable Roméo LeBlanc, the President of the Treasury Board, the Honourable Robert Andras, stated:

I also agree with you that until the legislation is passed the (applied) title should be used to identify the Fisheries and Oceans activities of the Department of the Environment. One advantage of this proposal is that no added costs in converting signage should be incurred when the legislation is passed.

We have been advised that the government intends to reintroduce legislation, dealing with the Department of Fisheries, at an appropriate time this Session.

AGRICULTURE

FEED GRAIN PRICES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have been informed that my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, has some information which he would like to give to honourable senators pursuant to rule 20, adopted only a short while ago. It is that senators who are ministers of the crown, on questions relating to their ministerial responsibility, may respond in the oral question period.

• (2020)

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, this does not fall within my responsibility, but I should like to answer a question asked November 16 by Senator Olson respecting feed grain prices. I was asked to contact the minister responsible for the Wheat Board to obtain an answer to the question asked. I have done so, and the minister supplied the following answer in writing:

Initially I should indicate that throughout the world feed grain production and supplies in 1978 are very substantial and this has had a depressing effect on the general price level of feed grains in world markets. Nevertheless I am pleased to report to you that producer marketings of oats and barley to the Canadian Wheat Board and marketing of wheat, oats and barley to the domestic feed grain market have increased substantially in this crop year compared to 1977-78. Producer marketings of these grains for this crop year to November 8 were 1.6 million tonnes compared to 1.1 million tonnes for the same period last year. Though current prices are not as high as we would like, the substantial volume of producer marketings are helping to maintain farm cash flow and should begin to strengthen domestic feed grain prices relative to the world price level.

In conjunction with these increased producer marketings, shipments from country elevators and exports by the Canadian Wheat Board are both running considerably ahead of last year. Barley shipments are 21 per cent above last year while exports of barley were 1.2 million tonnes for this crop year to November 8 compared to 800,000 tonnes for the same period in 1977. Projected exports of barley for 1978-79 are in excess of 4 million tonnes, considerably above the 3.35 million tonnes marketed last year.

Therefore, to answer your question specifically, the substantially increased export program, particularly for barley, in this crop year should, if not immediately at least over the course of the year, relieve some of the pressure on domestic feed grain prices which currently exists due to the substantial supplies of feed grain in the prairies.

TRANSPORTATION

LANDING RIGHTS OF CANADIAN AND BRITISH AIRLINES—QUESTION

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he can give us any information about negotiations currently taking place between Canada and the United Kingdom regarding landing rights of Canadian airlines in the London area. In explanation, I should say that from what I have seen at the present time Canadian airlines are being moved from Heathrow to Gatwick. Can the leader give us the reasons for this treatment?

As a supplementary, I should also like to ask the leader—and I know this question can only be taken as notice—what United Kingdom airlines have landing rights in Canada, at what airports, and what Canadian airlines have landing rights in the United Kingdom, and at what airports? I ask this question in order to be better informed on the relationship between the airlines of these two countries.

Senator Perrault: Because of the detailed nature of the question, I must take it as notice. Negotiations have been underway for some time, as the honourable senator is aware, but I have no current report available at this time.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMUNE OF THE PEOPLE'S TEMPLE IN JONESTOWN, GUYANA—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if the government has been informed whether any Canadians were involved in the People's Temple religious sect in Jonestown, Guyana, and the mass murder and suicides that took place there over the weekend?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

TRANSPORTATION

REPORT OF MCKENZIE ROYAL COMMISSION ON BRITISH COLUMBIA RAILWAY—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, last Friday the Government of British Columbia released the final report of the McKenzie Royal Commission on the British Columbia Railway. In short, the major recommendation is that the British Columbia Railway be sold to Canadian National and that the province write off approximately $700 million of British Columbia Railway debt and equity loss. The unrecoverable loss in this decade alone is $360 million.

I should like the government leader to inform this chamber whether the Canadian National is prepared to negotiate for the acquisition of the British Columbia Railway on terms outlined by the McKenzie Royal Commission, or alternatively whether the Government of Canada might directly purchase the railway and allow it to be operated by Canadian National.

Senator Perrault: That question must certainly be taken as notice. I have no knowledge of any such decision.

STUDENT LOANS

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—QUESTION

Senator Buckwold: I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. Some months ago it was reported in the Toronto Star that 55,000 Canadians who borrowed money to go to university had defaulted on their government guaranteed student loans. As I recall, this matter was raised in this chamber. Could we have a report on any progress that is being made in respect of these defaulted student loan accounts?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that information will be sought as quickly as possible.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

COMMITMENT BY GOVERNMENT LEADER RESPECTING REPRESENTATIONS BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: May I ask the Leader of the Government if he has been informed of the question I put last week in his absence, on November 14, about the commitment with regard to people who wanted to make representations about amendments to the Canada Labour Code? It is reported at pages 180 and 181 of Hansard. The deputy leader said he would bring this question to the attention of the leader. I am giving him notice now.

Senator Perrault: I appreciate the courtesy of the Leader of the Opposition. Notice will be taken of that question and the information will be sought.

THE SENATE

MEDIA COVERAGE OF QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—QUESTION

Senator Riley: Does the Leader of the Government or his office have any knowledge of any media coverage of the question of privilege raised yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, and the repudiation made subsequently by other speakers in reference to the allegations made in the other place, which actually were a reflection upon the integrity of this house?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have not had an opportunity to peruse all current publications reporting the events which take place in Parliament, but the publications that I have read thus far indicate that coverage of yesterday's activities in this place is not extensive. It would seem that coverage of the facts was pursued with far less zeal than was brought to the irresponsible circulation across the country of incorrect information the day before. I for one intend to make personal representations to the head of Canadian Press about what I believe to be a shocking lack of responsibility on the part of that agency.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CEREMONIES TO MARK THIRTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF D-DAY—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning the Department of Veterans Affairs. Last Friday in the other place the Minister of Veterans Affairs answered a question having to do with the thirty-fifth anniversary of D-Day next June. The minister indicated that plans were being made. Could the leader assure us that we will be apprised of any progress in that planning so that we will be aware of the very important ceremony that will take place next June?

Senator Perrault: Certainly to this time the Minister of Veterans Affairs has been very co-operative with the Senate in respect of missions sent overseas to honour our war dead and those who served abroad in Canada's wars. The honourable senator's inquiry will be forwarded to the Minister of Veterans Affairs together with a request from the Leader of the Government here that the Senate be included in any plans.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

VISIT OF U.S. SECRETARY OF STATE TO CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the government leader a question about the visit to Canada of Cyrus Vance, the United States Secretary of State. It is a welcome visit from my point of view, because I believe relations between Canada and the United States must be continuously conducted at the highest possible level. My question relates to the northern pipeline. I should like to know whether the northern pipeline is to be a subject on the agenda of the Minister of External Affairs and the Secretary of State and whether, indeed, the question of prebuilding is to be part of their discussion.

My concern is the growing belief in the United States that prebuilding the northern pipeline is a Canadian commitment to the establishment of a pipeline. That is not the case, and I wondered whether the Canadian government will make that point clear.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will undertake to bring to the Senate as soon as it is available a report on the meetings between Mr. Vance and Canadian officials.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1978-79

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79 and to amend the Financial Administration Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this borrowing authority bill seeks a supplementary borrowing authority of $7 billion for the fiscal year 1978-79. In addition to these supplementary borrowing powers, the bill seeks explicit authorization for the government to borrow in foreign currencies as well as in Canadian dollars. Also, an amendment to the Financial Administration Act is being sought in the borrowing authority bill in order to clarify that the use of borrowing authority is to be calculated on a net basis.

I will explain later the purpose of the last two requests, but for the moment I will concentrate on the need for the government to seek $7 billion additional borrowing power for this fiscal year.

For the fiscal years 1977-78 and 1978-79, borrowing authorities amounting to $21 billion have already been granted. This amount was authorized by the following acts: First, the Appropriation Act No. 2, March, 1977—

Senator Flynn: That brings back memories.

Senator Langlois: —$7 billion; second, the Income Tax Amendment Act, December, 1977, $9 billion; and third, the Appropriation Act No. 1, March, 1978, $5 billion, for a total of $21 billion.

In the fiscal year 1977-78 the government raised $8.2 billion net in the domestic financial markets. This left the government with borrowing power of just less than $13 billion for the fiscal year 1978-79.

At the beginning of the current fiscal year, this was considered sufficient to cover estimated fiscal 1978-79 financial requirements of $11.5 billion, excluding any requirements arising out of foreign exchange transactions, and a margin for contingencies. This margin was also considered sufficient to cover the unborrowed portion of the line of credit with Canadian chartered banks. Since that time, and as stated by the Minister of Finance on September 8 last, the financial requirements, excluding foreign exchange transactions, have risen to an estimated $11.8 billion.

However, this relatively modest increase in domestic financial requirements is not the reason for seeking new powers at this time. The main reason for seeking supplementary borrowing powers for the fiscal year 1978-79 is that extensive foreign borrowings undertaken by the government to bolster foreign exchange reserves have been charged against the outstanding borrowing authorities. This has used up the borrowing authority which had originally been sought, and which would otherwise have been available to cover domestic borrowings.

These foreign borrowings at the end of October amounted to the Canadian dollar equivalent of $5.4 billion. This amount covers bond issues in the United States and Germany as well as drawings on stand-by credits which the government has established this fiscal year with the United States, and other foreign banks as well, on the stand-by credit with Canadian banks which was expanded this fiscal year. In total, the government has established stand-by credits in the amount of U.S. $5.5 billion of which U.S. $3.1 billion remains outstanding.

The $7 billion supplementary borrowing authority now being sought will compensate for the use of outstanding borrowing authorities emanating from these $5.4 billion of foreign borrowings. It will also provide some margin to cover possible drawings on the remaining $U.S. 3.1 billion stand-by credits.

The bill also seeks explicit authorization for the government to borrow in foreign currencies as well as in Canadian dollars. Over the years, borrowings have been made in several currencies on foreign markets based on borrowing authority wording comparable to that incorporated in sections 2 and 3 of this bill. In order to dispel any uncertainties regarding Canada's authority to borrow and repay in foreign currencies, explicit foreign currency borrowing authorization is being sought in this bill. A similar authorization was obtained on March 22, 1978, when supplementary borrowing powers of $5 billion were obtained.

In addition, this bill seeks to amend the Financial Administration Act to clarify that it is only the net increase in outstanding debt that should be charged against the borrowing authority. In the act as it now exists there is some uncertainty concerning the amount to be charged against the statutory borrowing authority in any period. This arises particularly in connection with short-term borrowings under the revolving stand-by lines of credit. When a borrowing is first made under a revolving stand-by credit pursuant to section 37 of the Financial Administration Act, it is clearly a charge against the borrowing authority. At maturity date the borrower may wish to extend the borrowing for a further period immediately. Pursuant to section 38, this would not be a charge against the borrowing authority, because the borrowing is considered a roll-over of a maturing issue. Should the option to repay a maturing issue be exercised after a delay, however, because of the manner in which section 38 is worded, it may constitute a further charge against the borrowing authority. This result would clearly restrict the full use and flexibility of the revolving stand-by lines of credit. The proposed amendment to the Financial Administration Act would clarify that it is only the new increase in outstanding debt from the date of the borrowing authority to the date of calculation of use of this authority that would be charged.

I think this explanation is clear enough to be understood by everybody, and it is a worthwhile improvement to section 37 of the present Financial Administration Act.

Honourable senators, I commend this bill to your favourable consideration.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, November 14, the debate on the motion of Senator Thompson for the second reading of Bill S-7, to implement conventions between Canada and the Republic of Korea and Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and an agreement between Canada and Jamaica for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, this bill was explained to us in considerable detail by the sponsor, Senator Thompson, who dealt with tax aspects generally to the satisfaction of the Senate and proposed that the measure be referred to committee. He suggested the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I made an alternative suggestion, but I do not know what has been decided in that respect. However, I shall have something to say about that in a moment.

The bill is more or less in the usual form of bills presented to Parliament for the implementation of "tax treaties," to use the generic term, entered into between Canada and other countries. In this case, the countries are the United Kingdom, Jamaica and Korea.

Honourable senators will notice at once that the same description of those treaties, or whatever they may be, is not used in all cases. Two of them are referred to as conventions, namely, the ones with the United Kingdom and Korea, and the one with Jamaica is referred to as an agreement.

[Senator Langlois.]

One of the things that I am going to suggest at this time is that the time is long overdue for Canada to take the lead in clearing up this inconsistency of nomenclature in respect to agreements such as these. There is a large body of literature in this area. Canada has, as a matter of fact, entered into an agreement to accept and adopt the nomenclature and various classifications which have been recommended internationally in a convention which is also described as a treaty.

It may seem that in this matter I am discussing only semantics, but that is most certainly not so, because the confusion between the various names of these treaties or conventions has already caused considerable trouble in Canada, and I am at a loss to know why the Department of External Affairs and others have not moved to tidy up the situation.

To give an example, the Auto Pact treaty if you wish to call it that, is certainly a contractual undertaking by Canada with the United States. When the Auto Pact was first contemplated, and it was announced in the press that Canada was considering entering into such a pact with the United States, it was suggested in the other place that this was a proper subject for discussion in Parliament. Here was a very important contract that the government intended to enter into with another country.

The official answer given at that time was that it was not a treaty, but only an agreement. I cannot think of a more nonsensical answer, but that answer prevailed at the time. The Auto Pact was entered into hastily without prior parliamentary consideration, and that has resulted in nothing but confusion and, at the present time, very serious adverse consequences for Canada, all of which might have been avoided—I will not say "would have been avoided" if the House of Commons had not been given that utterly absurd answer by the then Prime Minister that because it was an agreement and not a treaty it did not have to be referred to the House of Commons or to Parliament.

There are other examples of the same thing. It happened, as a matter of fact, with the renewal of the NORAD agreement, in respect of which the same answer was given, I think by Prime Minister Pearson, that it was a matter of the Crown's prerogative, and even though it was a treaty, it was none of the business of Parliament to know what was going on.

This is the situation with which we are faced at present. In respect of ratifications, honourable senators have asked on many occasions, "Does not Parliament ratify these treaties?" The answer is: No, Parliament has no right whatsoever, even when asked to ratify a treaty. This is still regarded by the Department of External Affairs, and by the Government of Canada, as part of the prerogative of the Crown—as antiquated and out-of-date a notion as one can think of.

Some of us will recall the lectures we had on this subject from a former Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am delighted to say that the present leader has not resorted to that kind of answer when this matter has been raised, but on more than one occasion has given us a much more sensible answer, and I hope that he will continue to do so when the matter is raised.

There is no doubt whatsoever that bills such as these are very complicated. They deal mainly with income tax arrangements between Canada and other countries. These treaties are three of approximately 23 or 24 that will now be in force.

Senator Thompson: Twenty-four.

Senator Grosart: Senator Thompson says there are 24. There are approximately 15 that are under negotiation, and there will be others to come.

It is important that we get away from this rather absurd situation of being presented with three, two of which are called "conventions" and one an "agreement". As I have said, it makes no sense at all, and all of the literature, the decisions in international law, make it very clear that there is no sensible reason whatsoever for calling these similar contracts by different names. As I have indicated, it can lead to considerable confusion and redound in certain cases to the disadvantage of Canada.

The present pacts, of course, deal generally with the avoidance of double taxation on income tax, and with other matters such as withholding tax on dividends and royalties, capital gains, and some related matters. For this reason, it has been the practice in the past to refer such bills to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I believe there was good reason for that, and there may still be, because of the very complicated nature of the tax implications for both individuals and corporations in the provisions of bills such as this, because the purpose of these bills is to implement—that is, to give effect in law in Canada to such conventions and agreements.

For example, it is interesting to note that the bill provides that the provisions contained in these agreements—I will call them all agreements for the moment—have the force of law in Canada. This is part, but only part, of the implementation of the agreements. The reason, again, is the prerogative of the Crown—that is, of the executive—in the matter of international treaties or agreements.

Any treaty entered into by Canada can be entered into by the executive without any reference, before or after, to the Parliament of Canada. That, I suggest, is an absurd and undemocratic situation. It is an impossible situation and one which should not be tolerated much longer. Those who may object to my remarks will naturally cite the famous Mackenzie King principle. Mackenzie King said on more than one occasion that it was intolerable that any treaty of substance dealing with such things as peace, neutrality, trade, on large contractual arrangements, should ever be entered into without prior reference to Parliament. This is said to be the doctrine. The Department of External Affairs will tell you that this is the current doctrine. It is the current doctrine far more honoured in the breach than in the observance. It has been followed sometimes, but not always, in the whole history of these types of agreements.

By the way, in Canada so far we have given 37 different names to these things. We play around with these names. This absurdity of nomenclature has also caused some serious problems in federal-provincial relations. I need only cite the situation in Quebec a few years ago when there was entered into what was called a "procès-verbal," which is a recognized term for a treaty or agreement in international law, between the Minister of Education of the Province of Quebec, the Minister of Education of France and the Director General of the Department of Culture and Technology in the French Foreign Office. Given the signatories involved, that was as clear an international treaty as one could think of. But the fiction was then resorted to that this should not be called a procès-verbal; that it should be downgraded in name. As a result, such agreements are now called "ententes."

Again, this points up the absurdity of playing around with names. Canada could take the lead right now and issue a description of the various types of agreements related to the levels at which they are negotiated—head of state to head of state, minister to minister, department to department, official to official, province to state, and province to foreign country. Some will say that this cannot be; that there are decisions that insist that the treaty-making power is exclusive to the federal authority.

Well, there are already famous cases in the law reports which make it clear that there are treaties recognized in international law between provinces and states and foreign countries. They are covered up by various devices, but there is no question that they exist. We all know of them. They include such things as agreements, if you like, about roads, about transport licensing, and so forth. Yet we carry on this fiction, and also the fiction that the federal government is sovereign in the sense that it can conclude and implement a treaty in any area, which, of course, it cannot.

We have the famous Labour Conventions case which makes it very clear that the federal government cannot enter into obligations in respect of certain powers which are given under the BNA Act exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces. This is one reason why the subject matter of treaties should be referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate, thereby giving us an opportunity to initiate a discussion on what, to me, is a very important point.

When I use the word "treaties"—and it is impossible to avoid it—it is essential, I think, to say that in the accepted definitions there is a distinction made between what is called a capital or upper case "T" treaty and a lower case "t" treaty. There is no reason in the world why all of these conventions and agreements should not be called treaties if that is a decision that would clarify this whole area of discussion, which I believe it would. As I said, we have acceded to the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, but we are not doing very much to implement our undertaking at Vienna.

In addition to declaring that the provisions of these conventions and agreements that are before us are declared to have the force of law in Canada, we also have—and you will find this in clause 5—a provision to the effect that if any other law conflicts with these international agreements, the wording of the conventions and agreements prevails.

The minister is given the authority to make regulations, and I am glad to see the phrase "such regulations as are necessary for the purpose of carrying out the Convention (Agreement) or for giving effect to any of the provisions thereof." That now seems to be the current phrase, and I think we in the Senate can claim some credit for convincing the draftsmen in the Department of Justice never again to use the phrase "which the minister may think necessary." Clearly, the provision should be that the regulations must be shown to be necessary, so that any persons who feel injured by a regulation and have recourse to the law can at least plead, if they so believe, that the regulation in question was not necessary.

Finally, in clause 5 there is this very unusual and extraordinary provision—I am not objecting to it in principle—which considers the situation that will arise where it is found necessary to make changes and amendments in the provisions of the agreements and conventions. A device has been developed—and I will not go into it in any detail—whereby under the legislation the Governor in Council is given the authority to proclaim that such changes may also have the force of law in Canada. There may be a slight vacuum here, but the purpose is to give them exactly the same force in law in Canada as the provisions of the original agreements and conventions. But then it is provided that either house, or both houses acting together, may by a long and involved method intervene to revoke the supplementary provisions. I do not know what genius devised it. Of course we had this before us on another occasion, when the first genius who devised this method forgot all about the Senate and, as some honourable senators will recall, we had to correct that.

What it says is that any order made under this provision—that is, clause 10—shall be laid before Parliament not later than the fifteenth sitting day of Parliament after it is issued, and must be tabled in both houses of Parliament. Then, in a long, tortuous proceeding, either house—not less than 20 members of the Senate and not less than 50 members of the House of Commons—may file an objection with the Speaker. There is a five-hour limit on the debate, and if the decision is to concur in the objection, it goes to the other house. If the other house agrees, then the supplementary provision falls. If both houses do not agree the provision stands. This, I think, is probably a necessary device, because it would cause complications in international negotiations if it were necessary to come back to Parliament every time before implementation could be obtained on such agreements.

This raises another question which perhaps the sponsor of the bill, who, I know, has given a good deal of consideration to these matters, might be able to answer. Why, when these agreements—and there are many more to come—are reached and signed, do they not come to us immediately? Why do we get them in bundles? Is there any particular reason why we should wait? These particular conventions and agreements have been signed at different times. It would seem to me to make sense for them to come to us one at a time, each in one bill, instead of in this fashion, which makes it difficult to go through them to see what differences have developed over the years.

This is a new situation, or more or less a new situation. For a long time these conventions, agreement or treaties, or whatever you want to call them, tended to be almost exactly the same. In two that are before us—the one with the United Kingdom and the one with Jamaica—there are considerable changes vis-à-vis the existing ones, some of which are substantial, and which Senator Thompson pointed out in his introduction. The Korean situation, of course, is new, so there are no such changes in that case, but the changes in the other two conventions are exceedingly complicated. It would seem to me that in the case of the United Kingdom convention, for example, it would facilitate the consideration that must be given if it were before us by itself, instead of having the Jamaica agreement, which also contains substantial differences from the previous one, included in the bill with it. There is a particular reason for this. In the case of developing Third World countries we are agreeing to tax percentages that we would not agree to in the case of countries that are not in the Third World.

While there may be a reason for it, I suggest it does not make any sense to deal with these treaties in an omnibus fashion. In fact, I believe the majority of us object to this method of dealing with any set of measures, and I hope that, in future, consideration will be given to letting us consider these conventions and agreements individually, and as soon as possible after they are signed. There is no reason for delay, and a delay of a month, two months, or three months can substantially affect those who stand to benefit, or otherwise, under the bill.

On motion of Senator Hayden, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

COMMUNE OF THE PEOPLE'S TEMPLE IN JONESTOWN, GUYANA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on November 21 a question was asked by Senator Olson with respect to the commune of the People's Temple in Jonestown, Guyana. The question related to the possibility of Canadians being involved in the People's Temple incident. I should like to inform the Senate that the High Commissioner in Georgetown, Guyana, has checked on the situation and has been informed by the Guyanese authorities and the United States Embassy that there is no record of any Canadians at Jonestown, or at the People's Temple at Jonestown.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a supplementary question. Would he inquire whether any Canadians were ever members of the People's Temple religious sect? I ask this question because there have been reports that a so-called death squad, financially supported by a large sum of money, had been organized to kill some of the former members of the sect in the event that this mass suicide took place. This threat has been taken so seriously by some police authorities in the United States that they are providing protection for former or surviving members of the sect. Would the leader make inquiries to find out if any Canadians ever belonged to the sect?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, that may be difficult information to acquire. However, the question will be referred to the appropriate government source to determine whether any list of Canadians who were members of that particular organization is available. Generally, it is not the practice of government departments to attempt to establish the religious affiliation of any Canadian citizen.

THE SENATE

MEDIA COVERAGE OF QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Riley asked the following question:

Does the Leader of the Government or his office have any knowledge of any media coverage of the question of privilege raised yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, and the repudiation made subsequently by other speakers in reference to the allegations made in the other place, which actually were a reflection upon the integrity of this House?

I had an opportunity this morning to have a personal conversation with the chief of the Canadian Press Bureau in Ottawa, Mr. Arch MacKenzie. Additionally, Mr. MacKenzie provided a copy of a Canadian Press story transmitted nationally early Tuesday, November 21, concerning passage by the Senate of Bill C-5. I shall quote directly from his letter, as follows:

This is in connection with your Senate remarks yesterday that you had seen nothing in the media about that action.

May I say that I have yet to see anything printed in the newspapers—although other senators may have read stories—based upon the report transmitted by Canadian Press to its subscribers on the morning of November 21. Mr. MacKenzie concludes:

I repeat: It is a matter of serious regret that CP erred last week in reporting that the Commons had acted promptly on this legislation when in fact it took more than a month to do so.

On behalf of all honourable senators, may I say that we appreciate the explanation received from the bureau chief of Canadian Press, which endeavours to help set the record straight.

If any senators are interested in the Canadian Press story that was filed, it could be made available to them on an individual basis. I do not think it is the type of document that should form part of our proceedings.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, what I read in the press yesterday did not relate to the question of privilege. It related only to the passage of Bill C-5 in this house. It did not refer to the question of privilege that was raised, nor to the article that was published last Friday about the behaviour of the Senate.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, may I say to the Leader of the Government that I saw that press release. The headline stated that it was as a result of the rebuke by the House of Commons that we did indeed get the bill through very quickly—which again is hypocritical.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the story was written by Douglas Long. I have a copy here. If the Leader of the Opposition has not received a copy, I will be pleased to make it available to him. Perhaps it is not the precise article that would have been authored by the journalists in our ranks. It still contains suggestions that Bill C-5 was rushed through under pressure, as Senator Marshall has suggested; but it does suggest that some progress has been made in the matter of having the record corrected.

The story contains approximately 600 words and details quite carefully the interventions made by the Leader of the Opposition in this chamber, the Leader of the Government, Senator Croll, and others. That, really, is all I can say at this point.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

CHANGE IN WRIT OF ELECTION—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on November 7 the Honourable Senator Forsey asked a question relating to the form for the writ of election in the Canada Elections Act. I understand that Senator Forsey has received a written explanation of this matter from Mr. Hamel, the Chief Electoral Officer. Honourable senators, if that reply is satisfactory—and I understand it is—we shall not need to deal with the matter again in this question period.

ENERGY

AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA ON PRICE OF OIL—TABLING IN SENATE—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, last Friday the Honourable Alastair Gillespie, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, agreed to table in the Commons—and this can be found at page 1231 of the Commons Hansard—a copy of the agreement between Alberta and Canada respecting future increases in the price of petroleum. He pointed out that this should have been tabled, as far as he is concerned, as a public document. I wonder if a copy of that agreement could also be tabled in the Senate.

Senator Perrault: I see no reason why the same procedure cannot be followed in this chamber. Immediate inquiries will go forward.

POST OFFICE

INCREASE IN POSTAL RATES—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question arising out of the announcement which I received on my desk yesterday about an approaching further increase in the postal rates. My question is, is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation to bring about this increase, or is it the intention to proceed in the same way as with the last few increases, that is, by means of a regulation under, if my memory serves me correctly, section 13 of the Financial Administration Act?

The reason I venture to raise this question, and perhaps I may be allowed to explain, is that twice now the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has denounced, as highly improper, and possibly illegal, the method followed in making the last, I think, two increases. The report this year, which was concurred in by this chamber and by the House of Commons on April 19, said that this was a most improper way of proceeding and called the attention of both houses to this fact with a statement of reasons for this conclusion.

In view of that I am hopeful, and I should like some kind of assurance from the Leader of the Government, that this time the government might choose to proceed by the traditional and more proper method which was used before making the last few increases.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, at this time the answer is not available to the fundamental question with respect to the method which the government intends to employ in proceeding with the increase. The question will be taken as notice.

As far as the honourable senator's other observations are concerned, they will be transmitted immediately to the appropriate source of government.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I must apologize to Senator Forsey. I stood in my place just before he did because I was going over to speak with him. When I noticed he was getting up to speak, I resumed my seat. I hope I did not cause him any concern.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1978-79

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for the second reading of Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79 and to amend the Financial Administration Act.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I am gratified to see that the agreeable custom we have of according a round of applause to senators who rise to speak has been continued in my case. So far as I am concerned, I am well aware that it is not meant to encourage me too much. I should not be surprised that, after I have finished what I have to say, my remarks should not receive that universal approbation that a perfectionist would wish.

Bill C-7 provides us with a convenient opportunity to concentrate our attention—indeed, it ought to rivet our minds—on the sad state of government economic financial management in which this country finds itself mired. Canada and Canadians are rich in providential blessings. Laurier was right—the twentieth century should belong to Canada. Our original endowment of natural resources is still rich. Indeed, in some cases it is increasing with new discoveries such as we have seen in Alberta, or with conditions that have increased the market volume for those resources we knew we already had.

Our people are vigorous and enterprising, and perhaps more skilled and better educated to deal with the challenges of the times than they ever were. Our problems of productivity, which I do not minimize, or of industrial relations, innovation, and industrial structure are considerable, but they are within our capacity to manage. Therefore there is every reason to assert confidence in our country. But, alas, it is quite another thing to propose the same confidence in our country's government.

The plain truth is that, in recent years Canada has been badly governed in federal economic and fiscal policies. We have gone dangerously astray and we can see in business circles, labour circles and, indeed, among people everywhere, a clearly expressed lack of confidence. It is not lack of confidence in Canada; it is lack of confidence in Canada's government.

Some members of Parliament have a very hard time understanding that there is a profound difference between the nation and its government. Criticism of the government is not ipso facto an unpatriotic exercise equivalent to running down the efforts of Canadians. The people of Canada understand that difference. They do not confuse any political party—not even the Liberal political party—with Canada. They know there is a difference. Their vote of last October was not a vote of no confidence in the country; it was a vote of no confidence in the government.

I think Bill C-7 gives ample grounds for their anxiety and concern because, in a peculiar sense it crystallizes the problems—indeed, it is a cameo of them—we are facing when we look at the bottom line in connection with the management of our federal affairs.

I have tried, in examining this bill, to look on the bright side, and I am glad to say there are a few good things that we can see and be grateful for. One thing that we can be grateful for is the fact that the bill we see today is not the bill that was introduced in the other place. It started out as a bill to authorize $17 billion worth of government borrowing, of which $7 billion was for current needs and $10 billion was in the form of a blank cheque on the future, in 1980. It is with a sense of relief that a number of us, I think, in this house, as well as in the other place, noted that during the committee stage in the other place some sane adviser had an access of wisdom and persuaded the Minister of Finance to withdraw this demand for the $10 billion blank cheque, leaving us with this balance of $7 billion to consider today. I for one am thankful that a precedent so destructive of Parliament's remaining powers of financial supervision was indeed killed—and in the nick of time. As you might expect, I ascribe some credit to the opposition in the other place for this turn of events.

However, this leaves us with the present request for an additional authority to borrow $7 billion and, in my view, to make good the mistakes of the government in 1978. It was only in March of this year that the Minister of Finance told the Parliament of Canada that his capital borrowing requirements at that time were ample, and more than ample, to meet the needs of the country for the fiscal year still in progress. Today we find we have an additional bill to contemplate of $7 billion, for two purposes—to finance the deficit on the current budget, and to provide the means to support the international value of the Canadian dollar. I want to look at both those propositions.

The current financial budgetary shortfall for this year—that is, the excess of expenditure over revenue—is now thought to be $12.1 billion. This means that in 1978 we are going to have to borrow about 25 cents for every dollar that we spend. That amounts to about 5 per cent of the gross national product that will have to be borrowed this year to finance the Government of Canada. I put it to this chamber that this deficit is clearly insupportable, both in absolute terms and as a proportion of total spending, and with its relation to the Canadian gross national product.

To set this Canadian deficit of $12.1 billion, or 25 cents per dollar that we are going to spend, in some sort of proportion a comparison with the United States might be illuminating. The American budget deficit for the same period is estimated to be $38 billion. This is an enormous sum. We know what the effect of this prospective deficit has been on both the internal and external financial difficulties of the United States of America relative to inflation in that country and to the value of its dollar.

Yet proportionately, if the United States deficit were as big as the Canadian deficit, to match ours it would not be $38 billion but something over $120 billion. Their deficit of $38 billion to match ours on a proportionate basis would thus rise three times if we compare the relative economic significance of the deficits of the two countries. Large as the $38 billion down there is, it is almost impossible to imagine the consequences if that were actually $120 billion, and if the United States, in connection with its deficit, were as undisciplined a country as we have shown ourselves to be.

There are some other useful comparisons to be made that illuminate the record of this government's management in recent years. We can look at some other governments where I trust reasonable comparisons can be made. If any senator thinks that I am taking an unfair advantage of statistics, which is always a great temptation in an address of this sort, I welcome correction that anyone might offer at a later date. I take the United States of America, the United Kingdom, West Germany and this country as a reasonable cross-section, a reasonable spectrum, of the industrial nations of the world. I invite you to look at the central government spending in those four nations, with 1973 as the base and with 1978 as the concluding period, after excluding inflationary factors in each country so that we find a common basis on which these figures may be compared. So, excluding the inflationary factor, taking 1973 as 100, we find that in the United States central government spending has risen to 123 in 1978. In the United Kingdom, the same series shows 100 in 1973 and 125 in 1978. They usually regard it as the horror story of this type of thing. In West Germany, with 1973 as 100, the spending of the central government increased to 128 in 1978.

In our own case, the same base of 100 in 1973 gives us a federal government spending in 1978, after excluding the inflationary factor, of 148. I think that is cause for some reflection. We can see here that Canadian government spending, after excluding inflation, has increased twice as fast as that of these other nations which we are inclined to compare ourselves with in matters of this kind. What is worse, it is still rising because the present government indicates to us that it is more of the same as far as Canada is concerned.

Let us take another measure which is relevant to the figures we are discussing in respect of this bill. Let us take a look at central government borrowing for the same four nations as a percentage of the gross national product. I am going to give the figures for the current year, which are close estimates, and which I think indicate the trend of events.

In the case of West Germany, central government borrowing was 2 per cent of the gross national product and falling—I stress the words “2 per cent and falling”—over the period. In the case of the United States, that percentage is the same—2 per cent and falling. In the case of Great Britain, it is above that at 4 per cent and falling.

When we come to the Canadian federation, we find that central government borrowing is 5 per cent of the gross national product and rising strongly. The new budget we have just listened to tells us that we can expect more of the same.

Figures of the United States Bureau of Labour indicate that Canada has the highest rate of unemployment among the industrial countries. If the observation is made that this may be an exaggeration, I have no comment except to say that no matter, unemployment in this country is deplorable by any measure. Indeed, the new budget, in my opinion, promises more of the same.

We have recently been told that inflation figures and unemployment figures are improving. If this is so, I join with all who are thankful to see such a result, and I express my hope for an improvement that will be both real and sustainable, but the sad fact is that there is no evidence, even after the budget of the other day, that the government has truly altered its financial course to give some ground for hope in the direction I have mentioned.

The new budget, as we all know, calls for expenditures of $51.1 billion. I think that is one of the lower of the several figures mentioned. It calls for a revenue of $38.15 billion and a financial deficit in the coming year of $12.9 billion, which is indeed higher than the one we face today. I think one does not have to be a prophet in Israel to suggest that before the current year elapses we will find that this amount of $12.9 billion is somewhat higher.

The federal expenditure is still rising faster than the federal revenue. The size of the deficit is still growing. I think we may even take some exception to the spending cuts that are claimed because some of them, at least in my opinion, are cosmetic in an important particular. Part of the expenditure cuts that have been advertised so widely—cuts, indeed, that I think are placed largely in the future—are at any rate proposed to be achieved in large degree at the expense of others.

We see, for example, that there is going to be a change in the equalization formula. They are going to remove from that formula certain provincial revenues which formerly were included. The result of that particular proposal, of course, will probably mean that the have-not provinces will get less than they otherwise would by some considerable measure indeed.

We have seen the unemployment insurance changes, and there will be an opportunity to debate them in detail later. One had hoped for basic reforms which would indicate that we were getting away from the dole and getting to work as a solution to our problems, and that we were going to solve the contradiction between welfare and insurance, which are so intimately bound up in the act as it stands at the present time. But instead of those basic reforms, which the system surely needs, we find some reforms which transfer the costs, to some extent at least, to the backs of the unemployed in the Atlantic provinces, and certainly raises the suspicion, if not the certainty, that as a result provincial welfare costs will be higher in order to make up for the changes in that act.

I might suggest that a third reason for thinking that some of the proposed economies are more illusory than real is that the federal contributions that are proposed to provincial costs of health and secondary education are to be reduced. These very serious proposals in previous financial undertakings and assurances that were given to provincial treasurers are now under pressure. If the provincial treasurers refuse to accept the change, as I suspect they will, we have been warned that other financial undertakings of the federal government will be reduced instead. So, as a result, they will certainly be no better off in the provinces than they are now.

I suggest there are some grounds for thinking that the system that we have seen deployed since August 1 by the spokesmen of the federal government is not so much cost-cutting as it is cost-shifting, and to a very large extent there has been a blurring of the real federal economic posture in this connection. I have to say frankly that such a way of handling this matter does not commend itself to me, because there are other policies, there are other ways and means of getting our federal finances under control. There are real possibilities which have not yet been explored, by which we can better adjust our revenues to our expenditures, and I am going to take advantage of the fact that this is a body with a regional responsibility to indicate exactly what I mean by reference to the province of Manitoba.

In 1978, this present year, the Government of Manitoba brought in its expenditure budget, and it was not 12 per cent over the previous year, or 11 per cent, or 9 per cent; it was 3 per cent over the previous year. In other words, it was keyed right in to the prospective increase in the gross national product, without an inflationary factor, as being a realistic way in which to try to get the finances under control—and it seems to be working. The expenditures increased to 103 from 100 in the previous year. The number of civil servants in Manitoba was reduced by 1,800, which is 13 per cent of the inner staff, and it was done without the blood-letting that one would think from reading the newspapers these days, because by far the vast majority of those civil service positions were dispensed with through attrition, and not because of any other aspect of the matter.

I just happened to overhear one of my honourable friends say that the federal government was stuck because it had statutory obligations. Well, that does not seem to bother them very much when they really don't want it to, because I can think of many occasions and instances, that I have already mentioned in my remarks today, in which they have not allowed a statutory obligation to deter them from shifting some of the burden from their own backs to the backs of others.

Going on with the Manitoba situation, the deficit in 1977 was $214 million. In the current year it is coming down to $130 million, and it will go lower. In addition to all those things, there has been a tax cut in that province of $83 million. If you are looking for a possible pattern, there it is. I do not say it is the only one, and I do not say that in all particulars it fits the exigencies of federal finance—I will grant that to honourable gentlemen opposite—but I do say it gives you some idea of what can be done if you happen to subscribe to this particular way of looking at things. I see in a recent newspaper report that someone has made calculations that if the policy were followed in the federal administration, our taxes would be down by $2.2 billion and, what is perhaps even as important, our deficit would be down by $4 billion. So I suggest to you that things can be done.

Rigid economies in Manitoba? Yes, indeed, but—and I want to stress this—no material cut in either the quality or the availability of essential government services. Pulling in the belt? Of course, but not to the extent where there has been an unreasonable diminution in the quality or quantity of the services that are available to the people of that province.

Senator Thompson: What about the employment record?

Senator Roblin: The employment rate, according to the latest figures, is the best in Canada. I am happy the honourable senator asked me the question.

Senator Guay: It is always pretty good in Manitoba.

Senator Roblin: The honourable senator from St. Boniface says that it is always pretty good in Manitoba. I think he is right. We do not always agree on everything, but we can certainly agree on that.

The truth of our situation is that federal spending is still not cut back. The federal deficits are still not being cut, and it is no wonder that we have trouble in supporting our dollar, because we have to add to this situation the balance of payments problem in Canada. In 1977 the estimated balance of payments shortfall in this country was $4.15 billion, and for the same period in the United States it was $15.2 billion. If I go through the same exercise of making proportional comparisons, I can say again that our deficit is three times as serious as it is in the United States on a proportional basis. Perhaps we are going to do better in 1978. I for one profoundly hope so, because it is one of the bench marks upon which foreigners rely when considering the value of our money.

The situation we are in is that we need to borrow to support the Canadian dollar, and we feel compelled to match and overmatch United States interest rates. So what a harsh light this borrowing of billions of dollars to support our dollar throws on the credibility of the management of Canadian government affairs because, believe it or not, until quite recently we were deliberately forfeiting credibility in our international posture by the vain pretense that we had a floating dollar, when all we were doing was making a few smoothing adjustments to ensure it did not rise or fall too fast. In fact, no later than last September—only 60 days ago—at the International Monetary Fund our Minister of Finance was still supporting this point of view.

Of course, the Governor of the Bank of Canada blew the gaff. He came clean with the Commons committee the other day, to make it quite clear that that was not what we were doing. In fact, no one was ever fooled. Certainly no one in the international financial world was ever fooled. They saw through this official fiction. They saw the billions of dollars being spent, and they recognized, if I can quote a pregnant sentence from Mr. W. A. Wilson, "the government's inability to speak to the country with clarity and frankness."

When you add that situation to our domestic deficits, you can understand why the responsibility for extra cover for the dollar rests squarely on the shoulders of the present administration. Indeed, if we bring in this bill as part of our public finances, we shall find that the interest on the public debt alone will rise from $5.47 billion last year to $8.25 billion in the year to come. If you want to get out your slide rule, you will find that is an increase of 66 per cent. How do you like that—a 66 per cent increase in the cost of carrying the national debt in one year! I don't know whether that has ever been matched in the economic and fiscal history of this country before, either by a provincial government or a federal government. It is certainly a record of which no one can be proud.

The cost to the private sector is perhaps beyond calculation. No one knows how much of the federal debt is going to be monetized by the Bank of Canada, and the fires of inflation fed in that way. But we do know that it is going to be too much.

So what a vicious circle we find ourselves in. The international price of the Canadian dollar depends on the health of the Canadian economy, and the wisdom of the managers of that economy. We now have interest rates which have been raised six times this year, a total increase of 3.25 per cent. This is bound to weaken our economy; it is bound to affect inflation adversely; it is bound to affect employment and output; and Canadian citizens and Canadian industry are bound to be hurt. We are going to find that the public revenues are depressed by this measure and the public expenses increased.

Many people might be tempted—and I am one of them—to make a comparison with our situation and recent economic history in the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom tried to support the pound in just the way we are trying to support the dollar. They tried to buy pounds in the market, and tried raising interest rates to figures which even we have not reached at the present time, but all to no avail. They found that they could not buy confidence, any more than they could buy credibility that way. They had to buy it by the use of really effective measures. They therefore had to submit to supervision by the International Monetary Fund. They reduced the rate of government expenditure and government borrowing drastically; they introduced neo-free enterprise policies à la James Callaghan, which has to be one of the most revealing situations in public affairs in a long time. They brought in an incomes policy. They lowered the tax on enterprise. They had a little help from North Sea oil, and as a result they got the pound under control and brought inflation down from 16 per cent to 8 per cent. Now, however, tragically, with the collapse of the incomes policy in that country in the last few days, that evil cycle may start up again.

There is a moral, and the moral is that credibility and confidence are essential to a sound currency, with all that it means in terms of inflation, productivity and growth. But confidence and credibility are commodities that cannot be bought. They certainly cannot be obtained by buying the dollar, and they cannot be obtained by increasing the interest rate. These commodities have to be earned. The point I want to make today is that this government has not done enough to earn either confidence or credibility.

We are being asked to vote this $7 billion loan for a government which has failed to earn confidence at home or abroad. It has forfeited credibility in the international community, and it has certainly forfeited credibility among the Canadian voting public. Its failure over the last few years in this regard is all the more monumental because we had a good reputation, indeed an excellent reputation, for being in control of our national, fiscal and economic affairs. This reputation, I am afraid, has been dissipated. It has gone with the wind.

There is, alas, no present expectation that we can, early or soon, no matter who has responsibility for the government of this country, regain our reputation for sound and prudent management of the federal finances. The government has called the tune, it is true, but it is the public that must pay the piper, and I, for one, honourable senators, reprobate the policy which has brought this bill before us, and I condemn the government which is forced to recommend it.

Senator Guay: I am wondering if the honourable senator would allow me to ask a question.

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Senator Guay: The honourable senator has made a very good speech, but I noticed that he omitted any reference to his own term as Premier of Manitoba, from the time he took over the office from Mr. Campbell—and there was a lot of money in the bank in those days—to the time that he left it. I think it would be quite contradictory of the present Conservative government of Manitoba, of which he has painted a very nice picture.

[Senator Roblin.]

My question concerns his intentions in putting forward Manitoba as an example for the federal government to use with regard to transfer payments. We all realize that the federal government participates 50 per cent in medicare, as it does in welfare and hospitals, and we must bear in mind the fact that the cut-backs that take place would reduce the participation by the federal government. Does this mean that he would expect the federal government to cut back in these various sectors by using the example he so vividly brought to our attention? I do not think this is the case, but I want to be sure of what he meant.

Senator Roblin: Well, that was an interesting series of question. It was a pleasant little speech, and I am inclined to congratulate my friend on it and give him the best answer I can.

Senator Grosart: Ask a damn fool question—

Senator Roblin: —and you get a damn fool answer.

Well, however that may be, I am rather flattered that he should make reference to my term of office in Manitoba. That was so long ago I would have thought he would have forgotten all about it, but obviously he has not. He knows, of course, that we gave the province excellent government. That is not to say that we did not make any mistakes because we did—we made plenty of them—but I think we were right more often than we were wrong. Insofar as the public finances are concerned, when I left the government of that province the provincial debt was minuscule. We had money in the bank. The government next but one after mine, which was of a different political stripe, was able to get along very well on the money that Roblin and his friends had very unwisely left in the treasury.

My honourable friend asks me about shared programs, and he talks about 50 per cent of health costs, 50 per cent of welfare costs, and 50 per cent of secondary education costs being borne by the federal government. Surely he knows that that is not so. He was a member of the other place for the last few years and he knows perfectly well that all those 50 per cent programs were done away with. As a result, we have a per capita payment, which may or may not be 50 per cent. The point he is trying to make is a valid one. How do we get out of this difficulty? I do not really think there is any immediate way we can get out of it. There is going to have to be a process of adjustment.

What I have been trying to indicate is the reason why we got into this mess in the first place. This is not something that could not have been foreseen. We have seen the deficit, if you want to take that particular example, starting about four or five years ago, creeping up. We knew about this. We just did not manage our affairs properly. If we had we would not be into these kinds of programs. Speaking for myself, I can remember an occasion when the federal government wanted to press money into the Manitoba treasury sack, and I resisted it on the grounds that I did not think it was a good thing for the province or the nation. We got it just the same, and we would have been very foolish if we had not spent it, would we not?

If the policies had been right from the beginning, the situation may have been different. Errors can be made, of course. Nobody is perfect, and it is nice to have hindsight, but just the same, speaking for myself, I am on the record as having made it clear that some of these programs of which my honourable friend speaks were not designed in the best interests of my province, or the country, and therefore I feel quite free to criticize them now, as I do, and as I criticized them at that time.

Senator Bosa: I wonder if Senator Roblin would permit me to ask a much shorter question than the one asked by my colleague. Senator Roblin quoted several comparisons with regard to inflation, government spending and deficits as between the United States, England and West Germany. Did his research also extend to job creation and the standard of living in those countries? Furthermore, did he also consider the interest rates that are now being charged by the Bank of England?

Senator Roblin: Let us deal with the interest rates being charged by the Bank of England, seeing that that question has been raised. That has been brought about because of the failure of the incomes policy, which recently collapsed. The government of Great Britain was trying to hold to a 5 per cent wage increase in the United Kingdom, which certainly their conditions amply warrant, but the trade unions refused to go along. As I mentioned in my speech, the fact that that happened probably means that the United Kingdom's progress will largely come unstuck unless something is done about it. That is the reason why their interest rate is now something like 14 per cent—almost as high as it was previously when they had the same kind of problem. I recognized that point, and covered it in what I had to say.

I am glad my honourable friend mentioned job creation, because I think it only fair to say—and I am glad of the chance to say it—that there has been a remarkable increase in the number of jobs in this country, and there is no point in trying to minimize that or overlook it. It is a good thing, and we can be thankful for it. The only problem is that it has not dealt with our problem to the degree that it should. Job creation has to be reflected ultimately in the percentage of unemployed, and if we have the worst unemployment in the industrial nations, as at least one authoritative body seems to think, it is pretty cold comfort to say, "Yes, jobs are increasing faster than they were." If they are increasing faster, let us accept that and let us be glad of it, and let us try to make it better, but I would not like to think that that solves the problem. I hope that answers the question.

Senator van Roggen: May I also ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Flynn: Why do you not make a speech?

Senator van Roggen: No, I do not intend to make a speech. I will just keep it down to a question. If I were to make a speech I might be tempted to preface my question with a remark about the demands of the opposition in the other place for more expenditures in every single budget in the last seven years.

Senator Grosart: Not true.

Senator Flynn: That would indeed be the subject of a speech.

Senator van Roggen: But I do not want to get into that.

Senator Flynn: And it would not be true.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators on this side of the house are just as concerned with the economic problems we are facing at the moment as honourable senators on the other side, but my question is simply this: Insofar as this particular bill is concerned, Senator Roblin, is there really any alternative at the moment but to deal with it and pass it? Is there a solution to this problem in opposing this legislation?

● (1440)

Senator Roblin: Alas, there is very little hope of being able to remedy the situation of finding some death-bed repentance which will eliminate the need for this bill.

What we are facing, and what I tried to explain—obviously not too well—is that this bill really crystallizes the whole situation, if you want to look at it that way. This is the culmination of what has been going on in the country for many years. It enables us to bring into one little argument on one little bill some of the thoughts we have about the mistakes that we have made—and I say "we", not "you" or "they"—in this country over the years.

What recourse the Minister of Finance has now I do not know. He could let the dollar really float with no support to it. I share my own uninformed, and perhaps unreliable, candid opinion that it would be a good idea if he did let it float. We might as well get this thing over with and find out what is going to be done with it. It would be much better to lance the boil than to apply some ineffective poultice, which is what we may well be doing. How could we do away with this bill? I would say, stop supporting the dollar. I know I would get into a regular donnybrook with a lot of experts on that. I do not present my opinion as being an authority. You asked me for my solution, and that is what I attempted to present.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps the alternative to the passage of the bill that Senator van Roggen has in mind—

Hon. Senators: Question?

Senator Flynn: He is making a speech. What's the problem?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: He does not have to put a question.

Senator Grosart: We seem to have some experts on the rules who do not know the rules. I am rising to make a speech, as I am perfectly entitled to do. I did not say I was asking a question.

Senator Denis: A maiden speech?

Senator Flynn: It is about time you made yours, Senator Denis.

Hon. Allister Grosart: I rise to speak on the motion.

Honourable senators, I was about to say that perhaps the alternative to the passage of the bill which Senator van Roggen had in mind would be its defeat in the Senate and the subsequent reaction of the government, which I would think could only be resignation. Then we would have an election and the formation of a new government which is obviously the only solution to the problem which Senator van Roggen has placed before us.

I am sure honourable senators would be very happy to note that that is the shortest speech I have made in many years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to remind honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Flynn: In one way.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, this afternoon we had the kind of debate that I had expected. I have taken quite a few notes to prepare myself to answer the speeches made by Senator Roblin and Senator Grosart, although the last one was very short indeed.

While listening to the remarks of Senator Roblin, I wondered whether or not he was in this chamber when the Leader of the Government made his excellent exposé on October 18 during his speech on the motion for an Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. At that time the leader put on record the Canadian economic situation in comparison to that existing in other countries, and especially those forming part of the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development. I checked our debates and discovered that Senator Roblin had in fact heard this very excellent exposé, and I am surprised that in these circumstances the honourable senator put on record the arguments that he did this afternoon.

Even although some of his arguments this afternoon were to the point, I would say that they were lacking in many respects, especially when he referred to provincial deficits of this country and particularly the deficit of the Province of Manitoba. I think it would have been very interesting if he had given us the total amount received by the Province of Manitoba in transfer payments and in cost-sharing programs. However, he left that out. If he had put on the record those very important figures, we would have been able to appraise his estimation of the real deficit and financial situation of that province. We could then have seen how much funding this province had received from the federal treasury. The question was put to him by honourable senators—and I wish to repeat it—and he should have told us, when he suggested that the federal government should cut its spending, if he included in that the transfer payments to the Province of Manitoba.

Senator Grosart: He answered that.

Senator Flynn: You do not have to belabour that point. He replied to it.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Langlois: I am making my speech. If you wish to make one, my friend, go ahead and do so.

Senator Flynn: I am just asking you to be relevant for once.

Senator Langlois: If you want to comment on my speech, you will have ample opportunity to do so. I am willing to resume my seat immediately if you wish to do so.

Senator Flynn: That would be improper as it is improper to be irrelevant.

Senator Langlois: This would not be the first time that you have made irrelevant comments.

Senator Flynn: It may not be the first time, but I don't do it as often as you.

Senator Langlois: It is very easy to throw the ball back when you have it in your own back yard.

I will not comment much further on Senator Roblin's speech except to put on record a few figures that may be of interest to the house. I have here a table showing the rate of growth of direct Government of Canada debt outstanding and those amounts expressed as a percentage of the GNP. This table covers the period December 31, 1967, to August 31, 1978, the last figures obtainable for the second quarter of this year. In order to give full information, I shall start by quoting the figures for 1967. On December 31, 1967, the amount outstanding was $20.8 billion, which was 31.3 per cent of the GNP. On December 31, 1977, the amount outstanding was $49.6 billion, which was an increase of 19.5 per cent over the previous year but which was only 23.6 per cent of the GNP. On August 31, 1978, which was the end of the second quarter, the amount outstanding was $57.1 billion, an increase of 15.1 per cent, which represented 24.8 per cent of the GNP.

To my mind this indicates that there has been a favourable comparison between the increase in the amount outstanding and the increase percentage of the GNP.

Another comment that I should like to make about Senator Roblin's speech this afternoon is that he described the oil finds in the North Sea as being of "little help" to Great Britain. I read in a prominent British newspaper last week that a member of the government had described it as a "godsend." That is a little more than a "little help."

Senator Flynn: If it comes from God.

Senator Langlois: Even when comparing the economy of the Canadian nation to that of other countries, particularly Great Britain, the honourable senator was obviously not too anxious to place the complete picture of the situation before this chamber.

He also made reference to the change made in this bill as compared to the original bill; that is, that the authority sought was reduced by $10 billion. He should have referred to the statement the minister made in the committee of the other place when he explained that it was merely a delay, and that he had dropped this amount from the original bill because he intended to seek another borrowing authority after the introduction of his budget.

● (1450)

Senator Roblin: And here I thought so well of him. I was trying to congratulate him. Now you have destroyed the basis of my congratulations.

Senator Langlois: You can forget about it, then.

Honourable senators, that is all I wish to say. Before resuming my seat, I come back to a statement I made when I introduced this bill the other day, when I suggested that it should be referred to Committee of the Whole after receiving second reading. At that time I had in mind inviting the Minister of Finance to come here in order to answer the questions that honourable senators might wish to pose to him. This morning I contacted the Minister of Finance and made that suggestion to him, but although he was quite willing to come, he unfortunately has a very bad cold. Also, he has a meeting with Mr. Vance, and there is a vote on his budget in the other place this afternoon. He told me that in these circumstances he could not be available for the Senate this afternoon. I then suggested tomorrow, but he said, "Tomorrow I don't even know if I will be in bed or in the house."

Senator Flynn: It is the same thing for us.

Senator Langlois: In these circumstances, having discussed this with the Leader of the Opposition, I think there is only one alternative left. I do not think we can leave this important measure on the Order Paper when we adjourn this week, and we should consider the possibility of sending it instead to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which is sitting at 9.30 tomorrow morning. I have not discussed this yet with the chairman of the committee. We could arrange to have the bill sent to that committee for tomorrow morning. Therefore, after this bill has received second reading I propose moving that it be so referred to that committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

I am now told it is possible to arrange for a meeting of the committee this evening. We could discuss that, and send out notices for a meeting of the committee either this evening or tomorrow, if honourable senators so prefer. I am told that the deputy minister will not be able to attend, but the parliamentary secretary will be there with the official who was the expert witness on this bill when it was considered by the appropriate committee of the other place.

Senator Flynn: I would much prefer to have the bill referred to Committee of the Whole. I am very sorry that we cannot have the minister here this afternoon, because he is really the only one who could give useful answers to the questions we want to pose. If my understanding is correct, we cannot have his parliamentary secretary here. If we could have him here we could proceed right away with consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole.

Senator Langlois: Under our rules we cannot.

Senator Flynn: This is the point I wanted to clarify. I can't see why the parliamentary secretary cannot come into the chamber, but the minister can. That may be correct, but I am not convinced.

Senator McIlraith: We could waive the rule.

Senator Flynn: Yes, we could waive the rule.

Senator Langlois: This would be quite a precedent.

Senator Grosart: We can waive any rule.

Senator Flynn: In any event, it seems we cannot have Committee of the Whole this afternoon. If the bill is to be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, perhaps it would be better to have the meeting tomorrow morning, just in case—this may be wishful thinking on my part—the minister feels better tomorrow morning. I would rather have him appear before the committee than the parliamentary secretary. Who knows, the minister may feel better tomorrow than he thinks he is going to feel.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I had an opportunity to have a personal discussion with the Minister of Finance today, and he really is in a very distressed condition. He has had influenza.

Senator Flynn: I hope it is not because of us.

Senator Perrault: The effect of the Senate can only be beneficial to one's health, so it cannot be suggested that the Senate has caused this. In his current condition he anticipates that the odds very much favour his absence from Parliament Hill altogether tomorrow. He stated that under normal circumstances he would be more than delighted to meet with the Committee of the Whole.

Senator Flynn: What is normal? The bill?

Senator Perrault: Normal health.

Senator Flynn: Oh, I see.

Senator Perrault: And a normal agenda. Today the minister is involved in very important discussions for all Canadians with Mr. Vance, and there are other meetings later this afternoon. We simply set forth the facts. It would certainly be satisfactory to have the minister attend tomorrow, but no guarantee can be provided. Under the circumstances, honourable senators, I think the best course of action is to have the same officials who met with the Commons committee, together with the very eloquent parliamentary secretary, who has met before with members of committees of this house.

Senator Flynn: Who is he, this very eloquent parliamentary secretary?

Senator Perrault: Mr. Martin, who is extremely able, and has impressed all members of the Senate when he has appeared here.

Senator Flynn: Tomorrow?

Senator Langlois: Tomorrow.

Motion agreed to.

SHIPPING CONFERENCES EXEMPTION BILL, 1979

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, November 14, the debate on Bill S-6, to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I am sure you will find that Bill S-6 is not as controversial as Bill C-7, which was just responded to by Senator Roblin.

First, I congratulate the sponsor of this bill, my Newfoundland colleague, Senator Lewis, for his able presentation of its contents. I apologize to him and to other honourable senators for the apparent delay in my response since second reading on November 14. My seat-mate that night indicated, after he had asked a few questions of the sponsor, that I was much more knowledgeable than he about Bill S-6. At that time I was not very knowledgeable about it, and I commend the officials of the Department of Transport for their briefing on what I feel is one good bill presented by the government, and one that should be passed quickly by this chamber.

● (1500)

Senator Flynn: They are bound to be right occasionally.

Senator Marshall: That's right—by accident.

As the sponsor of the bill indicated, the object is to provide continued exemption from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, which will take effect in April 1979, on the expiration of the existing Shipping Conferences Exemption Act which came into force in April 1971.

I think it is important to put on record certain passages from the document entitled "Legislation governing liner conferences serving Canada," issued by the Minister of Transport, as follows:

The Act excludes from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act those contracts, agreements and arrangements that (1) require the use of conference tariffs by members; (2) require conference members to carry out patronage contracts (provided that a contract allows ninety-day termination, not more than 15 per cent differential between contract and non-contract rates, and makes no provision for the payment of rebates); (3) provide for allocation of ports; (4) regulate the time of sailings and kinds of service; (5) provide for cargo or revenue sharing; and (6) regulate the admission and expulsion of members.

However, conferences are not exempted in cases of any contract agreement or arrangement wherein (1) a vessel is used for preventing or unduly lessening competition by a non-conference line; (2) cargo is refused because its shipper had used a non-conference service; and (3) a non-conference carrier is prevented from using, or is limited in the use of a port or other facility or service.

Conferences are further obliged to supply to the Canadian Transport Commission a certified copy of (1) contracts and agreements between members of the conference; (2) notice of membership changes; (3) conference tariffs; (4) standard forms of patronage contracts; and (5) all revisions or alterations to the foregoing. Notwithstanding the Act, the Director of Investigation and Research appointed under the Combines Investigation Act may, upon his own initiative, and upon direction from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or at the request of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, carry out an inquiry concerning the operation of any shipping conference.

I am sure that this document entitled "Legislation governing liner conferences serving Canada" contains lucid answers to all the questions that honourable senators may have. It explains in layman's terms what the provisions of the bill mean.

I have no hesitation in supporting the changes which bring the act more up to date, and I have no hesitation in saying that this measure is in the best interests of an international transportation service in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, November 27, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I would think a word of explanation is appropriate.

Senator Flynn: Required!

Senator Langlois: I should like to give as much information as I have now with respect to Senate business for next week. I think it would be well to adopt this week's procedure and have the Senate sit at 8 p.m. next Tuesday to allow the committees to meet that afternoon.

I shall deal first with the committees. On Tuesday the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution will meet at 10.30 a.m. and again at 2 p.m. The Special Committee of the Senate on Retirement Age Policies will meet at 2 p.m., and the Health, Welfare and Science Subcommittee on Childhood Experiences will meet at 4 p.m.

On Wednesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. and 2.30 p.m. to consider Bill C-15, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1978, and the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline will meet at 3.30 p.m. or when the Senate rises.

On Thursday the Retirement Age Policies Committee will meet at 9 a.m. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will continue its examination of the subject matter of Bill C-15 at 9.30 a.m., and the Transport and Communications Committee will meet at 10 a.m. to consider Bill S-6, the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979. There will, no doubt, be other meetings set down as the week progresses.

In the Senate we will proceed with the items on the order paper, and probably Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, will be sent to us from the other place.

In addition to this, we will still have on the order paper some three public bills and one private bill. I am informed that early in the week the Senate will introduce a new bill. I think the workload for next week warrants our sitting on Monday, as we have a great deal to do both in this chamber and in committees.

Senator Flynn: I must say I am not convinced that we need sit on Monday.

First of all, Bill C-10 may not reach us at all. In any event, I have made some inquiries and there is no problem involved with Bill C-10 as there was with Bill C-5. If the acting leader says that it will now be the practice for the Senate to sit every Monday, whatever the situation, I would readily agree with him, but when we decide on an ad hoc basis that we are going to sit on Monday, it disturbs the plans of many members. I just want to register this caveat and this objection.

Senator Langlois: I am pleased that the Leader of the Opposition asked whether this was going to be a practice. I should have said at the outset of my remarks that I expect we will have to sit on Mondays for a couple of weeks to come. We have often complained that we get a rush of legislation to deal with in the dying days of a session. We have a heavy workload now, and this is the time to dispose of it. I must say, with all sincerity, that we are expecting a shorter session than usual because an election must be held next year. This is not a prophecy I am making; it is a fact that we must live with.

There are three public bills and a private bill now before the Senate. Next week we expect to receive another public bill from the House of Commons and to introduce still another one in this house. We have this heavy workload early in the session, and I am convinced that we should dispose of it. To do this we will probably have to sit on Monday evenings for the next few weeks.

Senator Grosart: I am interested in the suggestion of the Acting Leader of the Government that we should start to sit on Monday nights. I would certainly welcome this suggestion if it is part of a plan to avoid presenting the Senate with bills at the last minute before a recess.

Senator Langlois: I did not say that.

Senator Flynn: You came close to it.

Senator Grosart: The Acting Leader of the Government did couple the two problems.

Senator Langlois: No, I did not; you are doing it.

Senator Grosart: The Acting Leader of the Government, I think the record will show, indicated that this has something to do with the problem of legislation coming to the Senate in a last-minute rush. If he denies that this has anything to do with it, I will accept his denial, of course.

I merely rose to say that I hoped he was really saying that this would prevent, to some degree, the presentation of legislation to the Senate with a last-minute deadline related somehow to a recess, prorogation, or dissolution.

Senator Langlois: I do not want to offend my honourable friends opposite. By way of explanation, I was merely referring to the many complaints received in the past, mainly from the opposition, about rushing legislation through on the eve of a recess—in this case it would be the Christmas recess, which is only four weeks away—and at the end of every session. Now we have a workload at the beginning of the session, and I welcome this situation, as I think all honourable senators should, because it will give us plenty of time to consider legislation at leisure and to our heart's content.

Senator Flynn: What legislation are we invited to consider at leisure now? Certainly there must be something wrong in my mind, because I cannot understand the reasoning of the Acting Leader of the Government.

Senator Langlois: I did not expect you to, because you never do.

Senator Flynn: You say that acting this way may prevent us from being pushed at the end of December?

Senator Langlois: I did not say that. I was merely referring to your previous complaints.

Senator Flynn: You said that we would be able to study legislation at leisure. The order for resuming the debate on the motion for second reading of Bill S-7, to implement certain tax conventions, stands in the name of Senator Hayden. He will probably speak on the bill this afternoon, and it is likely that the bill will be read a second time and referred to committee. The third item on the order paper is the consideration of the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on Bill S-4, respecting Canadian non-profit corporations. That report may be adopted this afternoon, and that will be the end of that. Another item is consideration of the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on Bill S-5, to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act. That, too, could be dealt with this afternoon. The next item is the second reading of Bill S-9, respecting fugitive offenders in Canada. The Senate dealt with this legislation during the last session.

Senator Langlois: There are a few changes in the new bill.

Senator Flynn: It could be disposed of in an hour this afternoon. In fact, we could dispose of what is on the order paper this afternoon.

If you wish us to return on Monday evening just because some legislation may come from the other place, that will in no way relieve the situation in the week before Christmas. That is what I object to. I think the reasoning is faulty, but if you intended to say, "Whatever the situation, we are going to sit on Monday," then I would ask you to say it, and I will accept it.

Senator Langlois: I made a motion. You can vote for it or against it.

Senator Flynn: Don't spoil the motion by giving us that kind of reasoning.

Senator Langlois: I won't try to make you understand reasoning. You never do.

Senator Flynn: I defy anyone to claim that he understood what you said. Who will come to the support of the Acting Leader of the Government with a straight face?

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

VISIT OF U.S. SECRETARY OF STATE TO CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, on Tuesday last I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question relating to the visit of Secretary Vance to Canada. I take it that the absence of the Leader of the Government means that no answer or statement regarding that visit will be forthcoming this afternoon.

However, I should like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government if he would, as part of the answer when it is made available, tell us whether any discussions were held with respect to maritime boundaries between Canada and the United States, and in particular whether there is any substance in newspaper reports that Canada has proposed offering a sectoral slice of the Beaufort Sea to the United States in exchange for an equidistant boundary at the Dixon Entrance on the coast of British Columbia.

Senator Langlois: I will take this question as notice.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, November 21, the debate on the motion of Senator Thompson for the second reading of Bill S-7, to implement conventions between Canada and the Republic of Korea and Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and an agreement between Canada and Jamaica for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, now that peace has been restored—

Senator Flynn: Perhaps you do not understand.

Senator Bosa: It is a temporary lull.

Senator Hayden: The other day I adjourned the debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill S-7 because of a statement which Senator Grosart made in the course of his speech. I am not objecting to his having made such a statement, but I just wish to indicate what I think the law is, and what I think the approach should be.

Senator Grosart said that the agreements covered by Bill S-7 are treaties, and the subject matter of treaties comes within the purview of the Foreign Affairs Committee. That statement was engendered by the sponsor's indication that if, as and when the bill is given second reading it will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

I think it is generally accepted that a treaty is a solemn and rare form of international agreement, and one that is not often used. The preferable type would be a heads of state agreement or an intergovernmental agreement. The particular tax agreements covered under this bill contemplate intergovernmental agreement.

If these were treaties, it would not be necessary to have them passed by Parliament. There is little statutory law on the question, but by custom and usage certain rules have developed and, as a result, the Queen in Council, or the Governor in Council, may, by reason of the executive authority which they enjoy in reference thereto under the royal prerogative, enter into such international agreements. Usually such agreements come into force by the exchange of instruments of ratification. That is the usual form.

I should add that at the odd time you will hear the term "tax treaty." By and large, I think, that is a misnomer. We have had one such in the last number of years in relation to shipping and the use of aircraft. That tax agreement provided that the earnings of a non-resident in Canada derived from either shipping or the use of aircraft were not subject to income tax under our income tax law, but were a condition of reciprocity. In those circumstances, therefore, there was no need to refer the matter to Parliament.

But obviously this legislation would come under the heading of taxation, and the reason is quite simple: Some of the provisions in the bill amend provisions of the income tax law, and only Parliament, which passes them, may amend the income tax laws and those provisions, and therefore, of necessity, Bill S-7 must be passed by Parliament. The moment you arrive at that conclusion, this taxation legislation, as I say it is, comes within the purview of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

I am not raising this issue for the purpose of attracting business to that committee because I happen to be its chairman. I am concerned only because over a long period of time all taxation measures have been referred to the committee, and, as a result, some reasonable degree of tax expertise has been developed through continuity of work in dealing with this type of legislation.

I can remember when there was a change in the Senate as the result of an election. The opposition became the government, and Senator John Haig became the government leader in the Senate. I recall that one day he spoke to me and said, "There is a tax bill on the order paper tonight. Are you going to speak?" I replied that I was, and he said, "That's all right." When he moved the second reading of the bill, he said a few words on it, and then said, "I call on Senator Hayden to explain this bill," which I proceeded to do.

I illustrate that to indicate how far back we go in considering taxation bills. For as long as I have been a member and Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I can recall taxation bills being referred to that committee. There has been considerable expertise acquired, not necessarily by the chairman, but by members of the committee. They have become accustomed to the language, some of which is awful, that is found in taxation bills. Sometimes it takes three, four or five pages in order that a point may be boxed in and no loophole permitted in relation to other provisions in the bill. Notwithstanding that, the history of this kind of legislation is full of bills to amend amending bills, introduced and passed a year or two years before, because there were areas that were not properly or extensively covered.

As to my presentation today, I simply want to emphasize that this is taxation legislation, because it amends existing law that has been passed by the Parliament of Canada.

My final word is that there are quite a number of subject matters contained in these taxation bills. To illustrate, there is the question of business profits. Honourable senators know that business profits, regardless of whether they are earned in carrying on business in Canada by a resident or a non-resident, are subject to specific rates of tax. However, the bill provides for a situation in which a non-resident is carrying on business in Canada and his business does not have a permanent establishment in Canada—and "permanent establishment" is defined and listed in the tax agreement. Its effect is to amend the existing income tax law in relation to the profits and the income of such a business that may be earned in Canada by a non-resident when the source of his earnings is not represented by a permanent establishment in Canada.

In respect of dividends there is a provision to the effect that the normal withholding tax on dividends paid from Canada, or from the other contracting country, shall be 15 per cent. Dividends being paid from a Canadian source to a non-resident would ordinarily be subject to a 25 per cent tax, but under this bill that 25 per cent becomes 15 per cent. That is a distinct amendment of present income tax law.

The bill provides that gains on the sale of immovable property are taxable where the immovable property is situated. This would be of distinct benefit to a resident of Canada if he owned an immovable property in Korea, Jamaica or the United Kingdom. If he sold it and made a gain, his gain would be taxable in the particular country and would not be taxable in Canada. In that way you avoid double taxation, which could very well arise, and which, if you look this clause of the bill, may still arise because the language used is:

● (1440)

Income from immovable property may be taxed in the Contracting State in which such property is situated.

I think it might well turn out that the gain would be taxable in both countries, depending on the construction placed on the word "may".

That, however, is beside the point. I have developed my main point, and I have nothing further to say about the bill.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Thompson speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I appreciate very much the contributions made by Senator Grosart and Senator Hayden to the discussion of this bill. As I understood him, Senator Grosart was really very flexible in his remarks concerning the appropriate committee to which this bill should be referred. He did suggest that possibly the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs might be the one to consider it, and from my conversations with him I understood that he did so because he has a particular interest in the use of the words "treaty," "convention," and "agreement," which he would like to see examined more closely so that we may arrive at the correct terminology.

All honourable senators appreciate how much work the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee and Senator Hayden take on, and, in fact, seem to thrive on, and Senator Grosart was thinking that possibly the Foreign Affairs Committee, having just finished a most worthwhile and concrete report, may be able to consider this bill. As I say, I did not think there was any inflexibility on Senator Grosart's part with respect to this.

Senator Grosart also acknowledges the emphasis there is on taxation in this bill, and also the expertise in this area that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has developed in their consideration of some 18 of these bills. I should say that Senator Grosart's other remarks were very interesting. From what he had to say with regard to the Mackenzie King principle, and from what he had to say concerning the terminology used to title these treaties, I learned a great deal.

Officials of the Department of Finance have been my advisers with respect to this bill, and they have been trying to interpret to me, as a layman who does not even have the experience of being a member of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, all the very involved wording—perhaps I could almost say technical jargon—which is to be found in this bill. A bill of this kind takes a lot of translation before I can understand it. Some of the answers they gave me to Senator Grosart's questions had already been given at the time of their previous appearances before the committee, but I now pass them on to the Senate.

Senator Grosart's first question concerned the title of each tax treaty. I now realize that I should not be using the term "tax treaty". From Senator Hayden's remarks, I suppose I should be saying "intergovernmental agreement". In a letter to me, an official of the Department of Finance wrote:

In "Canadian Treaty-Making" by A. E. Gottlieb, it is stated on page 55 that:

Canadian international agreements employing the term "convention" in the title almost invariably require ratification . . . The general, although not invariable, practice, is for Canadian agreements for the avoidance of double taxation to be called conventions.

This indeed described the general practice in Canada except in cases where a treaty is concluded with another member of the Commonwealth. Since the members of the Commonwealth have the same Head of State, it has been the practice in past years to conclude "agreements" and not "conventions" with them. This practice is not universally followed by all Commonwealth countries any more except that some still prefer it. The term "convention" is the one used by most countries which follow the Model Double Taxation Convention on Income and Capital published by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. Finally, the title of a treaty is subject to negotiations as is any other part of its content and in the final analysis a specific term has to be mutually acceptable. The fact that a tax treaty is referred to as an "agreement" or a "convention" has no practical significance—the words are fully interchangeable.

Senator Grosart pointed out that as between Commonwealth countries the term to be used is "agreement", but the particular treaty—and I will call it that—between the United Kingdom, one of the Commonwealth countries, and Canada is called a "convention". In the document concerning Jamaica, another Commonwealth country, the term "agreement" is used. The practice is, frankly, a little blurred as far as I am concerned, and I think it could be delved into more.

The second point raised by Senator Grosart concerned the length of the bill, resulting from its dealing with agreements negotiated with three countries, namely, Korea, Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and Jamaica. He suggested that there were considerable differences between these three agreements, and emphasized that in his view each agreement should be dealt with in a separate bill because, by waiting until a bundle of these bills can be put together, we may be holding up agreements which are to the benefit of Canadian investors and Canadian citizens employed in the countries concerned; by delaying these bills we are making those Canadians suffer. On this subject I will read further from the letter I had from the Department of Finance:

The main reason is that since they all deal with the same general subject matter it saves the time of Parliament in adopting a number of them at the same time. If each tax treaty signed since tax reform had been introduced alone, Parliament would have been asked to deal with eighteen separate Bills rather than four. It is felt that, because of the heavy legislative schedule of Parliament, this way of presenting more than one treaty at a time is appropriate. Senator Grosart indicated that the grouping of a number of treaties in a single Bill may delay the implementation of a particular tax treaty to the detriment of some taxpayers. We are conscious of this problem and try to minimize as much as possible any delays.

It would be useful, perhaps, to ask in committee if there have been any serious delays because of the bundling of these agreements into a group. I understand there is a delay in the case of one of the agreements contained in the bill of which I am the sponsor. It is a question that has justification, and I think it should be pursued. I appreciate that there may be many other questions in the minds of honourable senators, but I am sure they will be fully discussed during the committee's consideration of the bill.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, naturally, I am not at this time going to continue the argument. Some very interesting points have been raised by Senator Hayden and Senator Thompson. Because both honourable senators have questioned my comments on the use of the word "treaty," I would ask the sponsor of the bill whether he is aware of the fact that Canada acceded to the Vienna Convention of 1969 which defines the use of the word "treaty" in the following terms:

"Treaty" means an international agreement concluded between states in written form and governed by international law, whether embodied in a single instrument or in two or more related instruments, and whatever its particular designation.

Senator Thompson: I am not aware of that.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, let me say that Senator Grosart read that definition very well and slowly enough for me to follow it. Notwithstanding that, it does not resolve the question. The question relates to what this particular agreement is. It is a tax agreement. A treaty is an international agreement. It may be that a tax agreement, such as we have before us, is an international tax agreement—

Senator Grosart: On a point of order. Is the honourable senator asking a question or is he making a second speech? I specifically said I would not continue the debate.

Senator Hayden: I thought you had set a precedent by making a statement.

Senator Grosart: I asked a question.

Senator Hayden: And I am answering your question.

Senator Grosart: I was very careful to frame my remarks as a question.

Senator Hayden: Let me answer your question, then. Naturally, if I am answering your question, I do not do so by asking another question, although that is sometimes the case.

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Senator Hayden: I am merely pointing out that, as a treaty, it would not have to go before Parliament. But this must go before Parliament, and the pertinent point I made was that the legislation then becomes taxation legislation. Whether it is a treaty or not, it is taxation legislation.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps on third reading I can clarify the confusion that appears to exist in the honourable senator's mind on this matter.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Thompson moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA NON-PROFIT CORPORATIONS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill S-4, respecting Canadian non-profit corporations, which was presented on Tuesday, November 21.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, there is very little to add by way of explanation of the report at this time. The bill in the form in which it is now before us represents the product of three different efforts. It first came before the Senate in the form of Bill S-3 of the last session. At that time it was thoroughly studied, and many substantial amendments were made to it.

You will find the report on Bill S-3, and the explanation which was given at that time, in Senate Hansard of March 21, 1978. It would be a presumption on my part to attempt to repeat that.

Then during the summer recess—and I do not know whether this was the result of activities by those who are concerned with the bill or activities within the department—more amendments were devised and incorporated in Bill S-4, which was introduced in the Senate shortly after the commencement of this session. Following second reading debate, Bill S-4 was referred to committee, and again amendments were made to it.

To say that the amendments made during the summer recess, and those made during committee consideration of Bill S-4, are substantial would require some stretch of the imagination. They were needed amendments, and perhaps because they were needed they are substantial; but in the real sense of the word, they were not substantial. Some of them, for instance, were to correct a particularization of certain items where it is much better to have the greater flexibility of a general provision.

Unless there are questions, I do not propose to say anything more about the report.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Hayden could give us an indication of the total number of amendments that, while not necessarily made by the committee, resulted from the deliberations of the Senate committee in the final form in which the bill has come to us.

Senator Hayden: The statement I have breaks the amendments out in the following fashion: Amendments to Bill S-3 effected by the Senate committee and reflected in Bill S-4, English and French versions, 22; French version only, 46; Amendments to Bill S-3 made by the department and reflected in Bill S-4, French and English versions, 22; French version only, 48; Amendments to Bill S-4 effected by the Senate committee, 5. That gives a total for both French and English versions of 49, and for the French version only of 94.

Senator Grosart: I asked the question because I understand that at the present time an attempt is being made to convey to others some indication of the achievements of the Senate. The statement has recently been made that of all the amendments made in the last few years to legislation, eight out of ten may have been made by the Senate. The information we now have from Senator Hayden certainly tends to support that. It is clear from what he has told us that in the English and French versions of this particular bill there are 49 amendments, and in the French version there are 94 amendments, for a total of 143 amendments attributable to the Senate and its committee.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senators Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), that the bill be now read the third time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the second report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was presented on Monday, November 20.

Senator Forsey moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, this is simply a matter of re-affirming the imprimatur, shall I say, of this house on the criteria which the committee has adopted with the approval of both houses in previous sessions. There is no change whatever. It is simply a re-affirmation of the criteria which have been concurred in.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.50 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

An Act to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79 and to amend the Financial Administration Act.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, November 27, at 8 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)—REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

November 23, 1978

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979, were referred, has in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, November 9, 1978, examined the said Supplementary Estimates (A) and submits its First Report as follows:

(1) In obedience to the foregoing, the committee made a general examination of the Supplementary Estimates (A) and heard evidence from the Honourable Robert Andras, President of the Treasury Board; Miss Denise Moncion, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch; Mr. E. A. Radburn, Director, Estimates Division, Program Branch.

(2) These Supplementary Estimates (A) total $1,060 million. The budgetary expenditures total $1,370 million of which $975 million are statutory items and $395 million represent funds for which Parliament is being asked to provide new authority. The non-budgetary expenses, that is to say loans, investments and advances, include $55 million to be voted and a reduction of $365 million in statutory items. The total Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979, are now increased to $49,972 million.

(3) A request for $23 million under the Department of Finance, for payments related to provincial sales tax reductions illustrates a fundamental problem with the Estimates. The amount clearly does not represent the full amount required. In fact the largest part of the payment was made to provinces in the form of tax points which never would appear in the Estimates. In Quebec people were sent cheques of $85. However these cheques were, "paid out of tax revenues", but because it was considered a tax refund, it also does not appear in the Estimates.

The committee recognizes that as new techniques are brought into use, e.g. "transfer of tax points" and "tax refunds to individuals", the results detract from the principle that the Estimates should accurately convey the financial implications of the government's expenditure actions. In future where activities of the types described are undertaken, it would assist the committee's deliberations if the associated administrative expenditures were explicitly identified and the total sums involved stated.

(4) The Treasury Board supplied the committee with a list explaining the $1 items in the Supplementary Estimates (A), which is attached as an appendix to this report. Provision of funds for operating expenses through the deferral capital projects is a policy to which the committee has constantly objected.

A second objectionable practice associated with dollar votes is the lack of distinction in the Estimates between those cases in which projects have been terminated and those which have merely been delayed in their completion. The two cases are quite different. First, termination is a revocation of a commitment made by Parliament, delay is not. Second, termination allows funds to be applied elsewhere because they have been saved while delay means that funds will be required in future fiscal years for completion of the work. Therefore the committee suggests that the Supplementary Estimates make the required distinction between projects for which funds have been terminated and projects which have been delayed and show the amounts in each category.

Respectfully submitted,

A. I. Barrow,
Deputy Chairman.

ADDITIONAL EXPLANATIONS

Category DSolicitor General

Vote L16a—To amend the existing authority of the Inmate Earnings Liability Account to include the receipt of certain monies and the making of disbursements in accordance with the Penitentiary Act.

Explanation—The Inmate Earnings Liability Account was established by Appropriation Act as a special account in the Consolidated Revenue Fund in 1952-53. It was originally proposed that only money voted by Parliament would be deposited to this Account. It is now proposed to allow monies received by inmates from outside work sources to be deposited to this Account. This Vote will amend the original authority to permit the deposit of these monies and thus safeguard earnings of inmates. Disbursements will be made pursuant to the regulations of the Penitentiary Act.

Category EIndustry, Trade and Commerce

Vote L33a—To authorize the issuance of non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes to the International Tin Council in the amount of $4,500,000.

Explanation—In accordance with the Fifth International Tin Agreement of 1976, it is proposed to provide for a contribution toward the maintenance of the buffer stock of the International Tin Council. The objective of the International Tin Agreement is to assist in maintaining price stability in the Tin market by using buffer stocks to lessen the downward and upward pressures on price caused by changes in supply and demand. Both tin producing and consuming countries make contributions. The amount each country is requested to contribute is based on the amount of tin consumed/produced.

It is proposed to minimize cash outlays by satisfying Canadian obligations through the use of non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes. Payments, if called, will be made in the form of non-budgetary loans from the Foreign Exchange Account.

Canada's share in the buffer stock will be refundable on expiration of the Agreement in 1981.

Solicitor General

Vote 5a—To authorize the inclusion of two former penitentiary officers under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act for pension purposes.

Explanation—The families of two deceased penitentiary officers who were killed while on duty are presently receiving pensions under the Government Employees Compensation Act. Authority is requested to now declare, for pension purposes, that prior to their death the two officers were included under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act. The inclusion of the officers under the latter Act will provide for increased pensions to their families. It is considered that the present pensions are not sufficient to meet the full responsibility of the Crown as employer. Provision has been made to ensure double payment of pensions does not occur.

Similar arrangements were made in 1964-65 (Supplementary Estimates (A) and (B) and 1975-76 (Supplementary Estimates (A)) for other officers killed while on duty.

Transport—National Harbours Board

Vote 101a—To authorize the cancellation of Certificates of Indebtedness and the forgiveness of debt amounting to $133,412,200 and interest accrued and unpaid thereon.

Explanation—Prior to 1971 all payments to the National Harbours Board for capital purposes were made from budgetary funds and consequently did not appear as an asset on the Balance Sheet of Canada. Sections 29 and 30 of the National Harbours Board Act required that Certificates of Indebtedness representing such payments be deposited with the Minister of Finance and as such these amounts were set up as liabilities in the accounts of the National Harbours Board.

Since these amounts do not appear on the Statement of Assets and Liabilities of Canada and since there is little prospect of repayment it is proposed to authorize the cancellation of the Certificates of Indebtedness, the forgiveness of interest accrued or unpaid on the debt and the deletion of these liabilities from the accounts of the National Harbours Board.

The debts were incurred by the ports of Halifax, N.S. ($29,891,788), Saint John, N.B. ($34,770,238), Chicoutimi, Quebec ($3,830,286), Québec, Quebec ($52,075,243), Trois-Rivières, Quebec ($3,987,356) and Churchill, Manitoba ($8,857,289).

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, November 28, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SALE OF LABRADOR LINERBOARD MILL LTD.—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. The Government of Newfoundland has announced the sale of Labrador Linerboard Mill Ltd. in Stephenville, Newfoundland, to Abitibi, Price. One of the conditions of the sale proposal seems to indicate a commitment by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to spend certain funds to ensure continuing progress related to a changeover of the operation from linerboard to newsprint.

Would the Leader of the Government discuss the proposal with the appropriate minister and report as soon as possible details of DREE's involvement in the sale, to ensure that they will fulfil that commitment with regard to the jobs that will be created by the recovery of that important industry on the west coast of Newfoundland?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, while I do not have on my desk a detailed report with respect to possible DREE involvement in this important industrial development in Newfoundland, I can assure the honourable senator that the government of this country continues to be most receptive to any and all useful proposals to assist the great province of Newfoundland to achieve industrial growth and greater opportunity for its people.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EGYPT-ISRAEL PEACE TREATY—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on November 7 Senator Olson asked whether it was anticipated that Canada would be involved in any of the adjustments necessary as a result of the Camp David Accords, or, more specifically, the expected Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty.

In his address to the United Nations General Assembly on September 26 the Secretary of State for External Affairs expressed the government's readiness to make an appropriate contribution to assist in the implementation of the terms of a peace settlement if provisions were made for international involvement. Any provision for such involvement will not be clear until the present negotiations have been concluded.

COMMUNE OF THE PEOPLE'S TEMPLE IN JONESTOWN, GUYANA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, last week Senator Olson asked whether any Canadians were involved in the People's Temple religious sect incident in Jonestown, Guyana, and he requested that inquiries be made to find out if any Canadians in fact ever belonged to that sect.

As I said on November 22, it is not the practice of government departments to attempt to establish the religious affiliation of Canadian citizens. It is therefore impossible to tell whether any Canadians have ever been members of the People's Temple religious sect.

I can confirm that no Canadian citizens are registered with our High Commission in Georgetown, Guyana, who give the People's Temple at either Jonestown or Georgetown as their address. As I said before, Guyanese authorities and the United States Embassy also confirm that there is no record of Canadians at Jonestown or at the People's Temple branch at Georgetown.

VISIT OF U.S. SECRETARY OF STATE TO CANADA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on November 21 last the Honourable Senator Austin asked the following question:

My question relates to the northern pipeline. I should like to know whether the northern pipeline is to be a subject on the agenda of the Minister of External Affairs and the Secretary of State and whether, indeed, the question of prebuilding is to be part of their discussion.

The Alaska Highway pipeline was an important subject of discussion between Secretary Vance and Canadian ministers. Both Secretary Vance and Canadian ministers reaffirmed the support of their governments for the project. Although some specific concerns were raised, the issue of prebuilding was not discussed. Prebuilding, the concept of building southern portions of the pipeline in advance of the northern sections, would of course be conditional upon National Energy Board approval of natural gas exports and would require firm guarantees that the whole project will be completed.

THE CABINET

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I have some difficulty in phrasing a question that might be appropriate at this time. Perhaps the Leader of the Government will allow me to ask him if he will accept my compliments on the fact that in the recent movements which have taken place in the cabinet, and which have been described as a "shuffle," two of the most important positions were not affected.

PRIVATE BILL

J.H. POITRAS & SON LTD.—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-8, to revive J.H. Poitras & Son Ltd., which was presented Thursday, November 23.

Senator McIlraith moved that the report be adopted.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if it is the intention of the honourable senator who has moved the adoption of the report to make any comment on it?

Senator McIlraith: No, honourable senators, I had not intended to make any comment. There was only one minor amendment proposed, which was simply to add, in the preamble of the bill, the clause:

(f) since the Company was a body corporate to which Part I of the said Act applied and since there is no provision in the said Act for the revival of a company that has been dissolved, the Company cannot be revived except by a special Act of the Parliament of Canada;

That is the last paragraph in the preamble, and that is all the report contains, except the amendment to strike out the word "and" in one place and put in the word "and" in another.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if the honourable senator, who has vast knowledge of such matters, is in a position to inform the Senate as to whether this rather cumbersome process of reviving a company by act of Parliament has been superseded by the general arrangements now in existence whereby many corporate changes and initiatives that were formerly required to be made by act of Parliament can now be made by administrative act.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, the answer to that question is that two bills now before Parliament—the bill to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act and the Non-Profit Corporations Bill—contain the provision suggested by the honourable senator. The requirement that you come to Parliament to have a company revived is only applicable to those companies incorporated under the former legislation.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator McIlraith: With leave, I move third reading now.

Senator Grosart: At the next sitting, unless there is some urgency.

Senator McIlraith: There is no urgency.

Senator McIlraith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

FUGITIVE OFFENDERS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the second reading of Bill S-9, respecting fugitive offenders in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-9 is the re-introduction of a bill we had before us in the last session of Parliament, which was then known as Bill S-8. Part I of the bill is the proposed new Fugitive Offenders Act; Part II amends the Extradition Act; and Part III repeals the present Fugitive Offenders Act and contains other transitional provisions.

Bill S-8 which was before us in the last session had first reading in the Senate on January 31, 1978, second reading on February 2, 1978, and was passed on February 22, 1978. It was given second reading in the House of Commons on May 2, and died in committee of that house with the prorogation of the session.

The Fugitive Offenders Act is the instrument by which we return certain offenders who have escaped to this country from those Commonwealth countries which recognize the Queen as head of state. The Extradition Act covers similar arrangements with all non-Commonwealth countries, and allows Canada to seek the return of escaped Canadian offenders.

The Fugitive Offenders Act was first enacted in 1882 and has remained substantially unchanged for the last 96 years.

Bill S-9, so far as it is concerned with fugitive offenders, has two main objectives. The first objective is to make the laws more applicable to modern criminal activities and to make their administration more effective. This includes the protection of civil liberties of refugees from political, racial and religious oppression. The second objective is to expand the number of countries with which Canada may deal under the Fugitive Offenders Act to include all Commonwealth countries instead of just those which recognize the Queen as head of state, as is presently the case.

Many of the provisions of the bill are based on agreements reached by the Commonwealth Law Conference in 1966 and set out in the document entitled: "Scheme Relating to the Rendition of Fugitive Offenders within the Commonwealth." In the main, the bill seeks to follow the recommendations of that scheme, which are now law in some 49 Commonwealth countries, dependencies, protectorates and associated states.

At present, offenders are liable to be surrendered by Canada to any country where the Fugitive Offenders Act applies for any offence punishable under the law of that country by at least 12 months' imprisonment combined with hard labour. One problem arising out of that is that a prison sentence for an offence very rarely carries with it the added sentence of hard labour. Another difficulty, of course, is that that act applies whether or not the offence charged is recognized as an offence under Canadian law. Those are the two main reasons for the changes.

Bill S-9 establishes a schedule of offences that would be deemed returnable—that is, offences for which we would return the offender if the proper proceedings are taken. The definition of "returnable offence" has the effect of establishing the rule of double criminality, which simply means that the crime for which a fugitive can be returned must be recognized as a crime under both the Canadian law and the law of the country seeking the extradition.

The schedule, incidentally, is the same in both the proposed amendment to the Extradition Act and the new proposed Fugitive Offenders Act. The new schedule includes such serious offences as the various homicide offences, kidnapping, air piracy, rape, income tax evasion, counterfeiting, wilful non-support or abandonment of a child so that its health or life is endangered, and also provides that all the independent Commonwealth countries, associated states, dependencies and protectorates will in the future be covered by this legislation.

The bill does contain certain protection for the civil liberties of the individual. Under the present act, a fugitive may not resist surrender to a Commonwealth country for an offence of a political character. In the event of a political upheaval in one of the countries, a person could conceivably be faced with serious charges in that country for actions carried out while he was in the service of a former government, which actions would not be offences in this country.

In addition, there is a provision protecting a person charged with a returnable offence where it is quite clear that he is likely to be discriminated against on his return for reasons having nothing to do with his guilt or innocence. There is also a provision that Canada cannot refuse to surrender a fugitive where the political offence is against internationally protected persons such as visiting heads of state or diplomats and involves murder, kidnapping or assault.

I must say that I found the clause defining such a political offence a little troublesome, and I hope that it will be considered in committee. It is intended to preclude persons about to be extradited or returned to their own country from asserting by way of defence that a patently criminal offence is a political offence. That is the intent of the definition but, as I say, I hope it will be looked at in committee to ensure it is satisfactory. I think it is.

There is one substantial change made, and only one, between Bill S-8 of the last session and Bill S-9 of this session. The earlier bill gave the Minister of Justice discretion to refuse to surrender a fugitive to any country where the penalty for the returnable offence in question is death, since Canada itself does not have a death penalty. The revised provision—and it is a completely changed clause—allows the minister discretion to refuse to surrender a fugitive "where it appears to him that the fugitive offender would be likely to suffer an excessively severe or inhumane punishment for the returnable offence in respect of which his return is requested." It will be seen that this is altogether different in principle, and is a wider discretion.

The bill also provides that a person returned to Canada from a Commonwealth country may only be tried in Canada for the offence for which he is returned. Thus, if an individual is returned to Canada to be tried for income tax evasion, he cannot, without our first obtaining the agreement of the returning country, be tried for some other unrelated offence. There is provision for a waiting period in respect of that in the bill.

Where two or more countries are seeking the return of the same person, there is provision as to which country that person shall be returned.

Another provision in the bill deals with bail. In this case, unlike the general bail law applying to criminal offences, the person whose return is sought to another country is not entitled to bail unless he demonstrates why he should be granted bail.

The provision is different in that it places the onus in a bail application where it was formerly in the criminal law of Canada. It is quite different from the bail application procedure under our present criminal law where the prosecutor must show why a charged person should not be released on bail pending trial.

There is a curious anomaly at present in that proceedings under the Fugitive Offenders Act come before a magistrate or provincial court judge, while under the Extradition Act they go before a superior or county court judge. This bill provides that in both instances they will be heard by a superior or county court judge.

Another provision in the bill deals with appeals in connection with extradition proceedings. Under the present law, a person has the right to seek from the Federal Court a review of the judge's decision regarding extradition. The proposed new legislation would place this right with the superior and appeal courts of the province where the extradition proceedings occur, which is where it lies in other criminal cases. It seems to me that that is the appropriate place for it, and that is an improvement.

As I say, there is only the one change of substance from Bill S-8 of the last session, and that is with respect to the discretion of the minister in certain circumstances to refuse the return of the offender. That discretion has been widened.

● (2030)

There are a dozen or so minor changes in the bill. These are matters of draftsmanship and, as far as I can judge, they improve the language used. None of them change the bill in a substantive way. I, for one, wish to congratulate the draftsmen in the Department of Justice for so improving the language of the bill.

This is the second example this session of where the language of a bill has been improved in the interval between sessions. That is an interesting sidelight, but certainly the slight delay in dealing with the bill in the House of Commons brought about this improvement. I do not know what that proves or does not prove, but there it is.

Honourable senators, if and when this bill receives second reading I will propose either that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs or, if the house prefers, that it be given third reading. I shall be pleased to hear any views or comments on that point.

I commend the bill to the favourable consideration of the Senate.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, my immediate reaction is to say that this bill should most certainly go back to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Senator McIlraith has made it clear that we seem to have missed something when the bill was before the committee in its original form—that is, as Bill S-8—particularly as far as bad draftsmanship is concerned.

Senator McIlraith: Not bad draftsmanship.

Senator Grosart: I am not in any way going to be critical of the committee, but generally speaking we do catch these things, particularly when a bill originates in the House of Commons. However, it has been my experience that we do not always pay as much attention to a bill originating in the Senate as we do to a bill originating in the other place. This would seem to be the case in this instance. It is always a bit discouraging when a bill goes from the Senate to the House of Commons and they find something that, perhaps, we should have found. However, the same applies for bills originating in the House of Commons. So I do not think we have to be too concerned with that.

Senator McIlraith says that they did not find that, but my recollection is that during the meetings of the committee in the other place they did raise some of these questions, and particularly questions on the substantive changes that Senator McIlraith described. I should like to ask him, as far as that particular change is concerned, whether the effect of this change between Bill S-8 of the last session and Bill S-9 of this session is to exempt from return a fugitive from prosecution or sentence in another jurisdiction where capital punishment is in effect? I won't say a "fugitive offender" because I think that begs the question. It is a presumption. Every fugitive is not necessarily an offender. Is the effect of this to exempt such a person from compulsory return if he is from a Commonwealth country, or extradition otherwise, if the penalty for the offence for which he is either charged or for which he had been sentenced calls for capital punishment?

Is it merely a discretion by the minister, or does it in itself, in effect, exempt that person from return or extradition if the penalty for the crime from which he is a fugitive would be capital punishment?

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, the answer to that question is quite specific. It merely gives the minister a discretion to refuse to return the person sought to be returned in those circumstances. It does not provide for the refusal of the return of that person other than in the discretion of the minister. It enables the minister, if he wishes, to exercise the discretion to prevent the return of a person in those circumstances. In other words, the discretion rests with the minister. He is enabled to exercise his discretion in the circumstances set out in the clause. It is not absolute.

Senator Grosart: What I am really asking, if I may add a supplementary to my question, is whether it would not have that effect. If the offence in question is one for which Canada does not accept the concept of capital punishment, would not the minister be bound, in effect, to refuse compulsory return or extradition of an individual if that were the punishment in the jurisdiction seeking the return of that individual?

I was interested in the fact that Senator McIlraith, in describing this aspect of the change, used the words "inhuman punishment," which seems to presume that capital punishment was necessarily—and I am not arguing this point at the moment—was necessarily inhuman punishment. If that is so, surely the minister has no discretion regardless of the language of the bill.

Perhaps this question could be better answered in committee. I am not insisting that it be answered now. I know, however, that Senator McIlraith has studied the bill and he might perhaps give us some enlightenment in this respect, because I am sure the Senate as a whole would be interested in this fundamental and substantive change as between the two bills.

Senator McIlraith: I cannot agree for a moment that the minister has no alternative in exercising the discretion. It is an absolute discretion on his part. He must exercise that discretion, and he is answerable for the way in which he exercises it.

If capital punishment is still applicable for the offence of murder in a jurisdiction requesting the return of an alleged offender on the charge of murder, the minister may refuse to order that surrender. But there is no way one can stretch that to mean he must refuse or will refuse to surrender the person.

Since the clause in question is a short one, I should perhaps at this point read it into the record. It is subclause 18(1) of the bill, and it reads:

The Minister may refuse to order the surrender of a fugitive offender where it appears to him that the fugitive offender would be likely to suffer an excessively severe or inhumane punishment for the returnable offence in respect of which his return is requested.

That is the clause as it stands. I think it is fairly clear. There is not much I can say by way of expanding on it.

On motion of Senator Grosart, for Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the supplementary estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979, which was presented Thursday, November 23.

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

In so doing, I should like to mention that the President of the Treasury Board, the Honourable Robert Andras, with his officials, in particular Miss Denise Moncion, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch, appeared before the National Finance Committee. It was an interesting and productive session. All the questions were answered forthrightly, and, I believe, to the satisfaction of the committee members present.

As the report indicates, the supplementary estimates (A) total $10.6 billion, made up of $610 million for statutory items and $450 million for items to be voted. The largest of the statutory items include $400 million for additional costs of servicing the public debt, $262 million for payments to the provinces, and a $368 million reduction in advances to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The major items for which Parliament is being asked to provide new authority are $81 million for increased oil import compensation payments; $50 million for the federal labour intensive projects program, which was extended from October, 1977, to September 30, 1978; $43 million to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for discounts and administrative costs incurred in respect of the sale of NHA mortgages, and $18 million for payments to Interprovincial Pipeline Limited in respect of crude oil shipped from Sarnia to Montreal.

The President of the Treasury Board told us that the $48.8 billion expenditure ceiling for 1978-79, which he mentioned when he appeared before your committee in connection with the main estimates last spring, has now been revised down to $48.3 billion. This, he added, would be about a 9.5 per cent increase over the total expenditures for 1977-78.

I should like to draw the attention of honourable senators to two items in the report. The first concerns the use of techniques, such as transfer of tax points and tax refunds to individuals, to make payments that your committee suggests should be reflected in the estimates. This arose in relation to $23 million requested for provincial sales tax reductions. The second concerns the $1 items in the supplementary estimates (A). In addition to the committee's constant objection to the use of funds from deferred capital projects for operating expenses, your committee considers there should be a distinction in these estimates between projects that have been terminated and projects that have been delayed in their completion.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, in case there are any of you who do not know, I should mention that Senator Barrow, who has just moved the adoption of the report, is now deputy chairman of the distinguished National Finance Committee, and in spite of the fact that he has a very, very difficult committee to deal with, so far he has not run into any trouble and is maintaining the high standard of impartiality for which the former chairmen and deputy-chairmen of that committee have been distinguished. I except one former deputy chairman, myself. I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 8 p.m.

PARLIAMENT

MESSAGES BETWEEN HOUSES—SPEAKER'S RULING ON POINT OF ORDER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on Monday, November 20, 1978, the Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, presented the following report to the Senate:

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to which was referred Bill C-5, An Act to amend the Old Age Security Act, has, in obedience to the order of reference of Monday, November 20, 1978, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

The committee nevertheless strongly recommends that the Government consider the advisability of introducing at the earliest possible opportunity an amendment to this bill that would have the effect of making clause 2 of the bill retroactive to November 1, 1978.

The bill was then read a third time and passed, and a message was sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house accordingly without incorporating the recommendation of the committee.

On Tuesday, November 21, 1978, at page 234 of the Debates of the Senate, the Honourable Senator Flynn rose on a point of order and stated that the recommendation of the committee had not been included in the message to the Commons. He said:

When the Senate passes a bill in the form in which it comes to us from the other place but with a recommendation that something be done in respect of that measure, the other place should be so informed. Hansard of the other place does not show that they were informed of the Senate's recommendation in respect of Bill C-5. Also, I have been told that they did not hear that part of the report of the committee. That is a question of fact which Your Honour may verify.

I have now had an opportunity to look into this matter. It has always been the practice, when a Commons bill is reported to the Senate without amendment by a committee, not to include in the message to the House of Commons any recommendations and/or observations made by the committee.

May, 19th Edition, page 602, has this to say about messages between the two houses:

A message is the most simple and frequent mode of communication; it is daily resorted to, for sending bills from one House to another; for requesting the attendance of witnesses; for the interchange of reports and other documents; and for communicating all matters of an ordinary description, which occur in the course of parliamentary proceedings.

The last part of this quotation would, in my opinion, fall in the category of subjects such as the one under discussion.

The custom and usage when a bill has passed all its stages is to communicate that fact by message to the other house. If the bill under consideration by the Senate is a Commons bill and is passed by the Senate without amendment, a written message is sent to the House of Commons to that effect. When a Commons bill is amended by the Senate, the original parchment is returned to the House of Commons with the engrossed amendments attached to the front thereof. No separate message is sent. The message is endorsed on the bill itself at the end, as follows:

ORDERED: That the Clerk do carry this Bill back to the House of Commons and acquaint them that the Senate has passed the same with an amendment to which they desire their concurrence.

The point of order raised by the Leader of the Opposition is that when a Commons bill is reported by a Senate committee without amendment but with recommendations and/or observations, the message to the House of Commons should include such recommendations and/or observations. It is simply a matter of custom and usage and it has never been the custom to include the recommendations and/or observations of a committee in a message to the other house with respect to the passing of a bill. In my opinion, there is no procedural barrier to the inclusion of such recommendations and/or observations in the message to the House of Commons. However, I suggest that each case should be judged on its own merit and that the Senate should decide in each instance if it is advisable and in the interest of the Senate to include the recommendations and/or observations in the message.

In conclusion, it seems to me that whenever a Commons bill is reported without amendment but with recommendations and/or observations, the Speaker, after third reading, might seek the approval of the Senate to have the recommendations and/or observations included in the message to the Commons. The Senate would then decide and it could be so ordered by the Speaker.

This procedure is suggested because it is the practice generally followed when the Speaker seeks the direction of the Senate during the proceedings. Of course, I am in the hands of the Senate, and would like to have its opinion in this respect.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that I raised the point of order, I should like to say that I am in complete agreement with the opinion just given by Her Honour the Speaker. I will try to be alert on future occasions to move that the message sent to the House of Commons be complete.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of report to the Minister of National Health and Welfare from the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Committee entitled "Review of the Objectives of the CPP," dated November 1978.

RETIREMENT AGE POLICIES

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Norrie be added to the list of senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Retirement Age Policies.

Motion agreed to.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SALE OF LABRADOR LINERBOARD MILL LTD.—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, last evening I asked a question of the government leader having to do with the government's responsibility with respect to Labrador Linerboard Mill Ltd. in Stephenville, Newfoundland. After reading the government leader's answer in Senate Hansard, I am not convinced that he announced any definitive conclusions. I can only repeat the question in the hope he can offer something more substantive that I can pass on to those concerned.

Could the Leader of the Government offer something more definitive having to do with DREE's commitment with respect to the sale of that mill to Abitibi, Price? If he cannot offer it at this time, would he extract the information from the ministers responsible and report later to this chamber?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, immediately following the important question asked by Senator Marshall last evening an inquiry was directed to the Department of Regional and Economic Expansion requesting any and all information pertaining to this potentially significant development in Newfoundland. The reply has not yet been received.

ENERGY

AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA ON PRICE OF OIL AND GAS—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question following several questions I asked on previous occasions about the agreement between Alberta and the federal government respecting the dates for increasing oil and gas prices. I ask it today because there are some inconclusive reports emanating from the Conference of First Ministers that there is a new, or at least an amended, agreement, although this has not been announced in detail. Could the Leader of the Government tell us if such a new or amended agreement has been reached and, if so, what are the terms of the agreement?

● (2010)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that possibly further discussions will be held overnight and it may be possible to achieve some understanding tomorrow. I understand that a unanimity of opinion has yet to be achieved with respect to the desirability of raising oil prices on January 1 of next year.

Senator Olson: I would ask the honourable leader a supplementary question. We did ask for and the leader agreed to obtain a copy of the agreement entered into between the federal government and the Government of Alberta. I have not seen it yet. Has it been made available to the Senate?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the situation will be investigated.

THE SENATE

MONDAY SITTINGS—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government if he thinks the reasons given by the deputy leader on Thursday last for having the Senate sit last night were justified. I have checked the attendance last night. I was not present because I knew there was nothing to do, and there was something else I had to do.

I just want to know if the Leader of the Government thinks he was justified in having the Senate sit last night, and if it is his intention, even if no business comes to us, and just in case we should be pressed a few days before Christmas, that we should sit on Monday of every week until Christmas.

Senator Perrault: First of all, while the Senate does possess a remarkable range of powers, we are as yet unable to control the weather. The attendance last night was smaller than usual largely because of adverse weather that affected the travel plans of a number of senators.

Apart from that, it is not appropriate for me, surely, to discuss with the Leader of the Opposition in this forum whether or not in retrospect a sitting of the Senate was useful or otherwise or served some beneficial purpose. It seems to me that every time the Senate meets there exists the possibility for very useful work by all honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: We could sit on Sundays.

Senator Perrault: I think it to be a rather pointless exercise to speculate about the relative value of sittings of the Senate day by day.

Let me say, however, that there is a great deal of work to come before the Senate before the Christmas recess. For example, one of the important measures now before Parliament is the proposed unemployment insurance bill, and I suggest that we consider the possibility of undertaking a pre-study of it.

Senator Flynn: In the Senate?

Senator Perrault: In the Senate.

Senator Flynn: In the Senate!

Senator Perrault: In a Senate committee.

Senator Flynn: On, come down to earth.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator is hardly a political amateur, and he knows what I meant.

Senator Flynn: I am not an amateur.

Senator Perrault: It was a while ago that the honourable senator made his maiden speech—almost years beyond measure, in fact.

It seems to me that we must anticipate legislation which may be delayed in the other chamber. We do not want a situation which may see the unemployment insurance measure arriving in the Senate two days before Christmas, with the Senate expected to pass that important measure in a few hours. I hope that senators may be prepared to authorize the appropriate committee to do a pre-study of this important legislation so that it can be accorded the kind of serious consideration which it deserves. This may take time; it may require extended hours of that committee's time.

I intend, if the Leader of the Opposition can make time available to me either this evening or tomorrow, to discuss with him some of the work that may be before us before the Christmas holiday, a recess which is anticipated will begin on December 21 with a return of Parliament on Monday, January 22.

This rather long reply is an endeavour to suggest that we in this place must attempt to measure the work before us and that we must be prepared to give every measure the deliberation time necessary. It was anticipated that we would require every hour this week for the work we thought we would have before us.

Senator Flynn: I would suggest that your measurement last week was pretty bad. In any event, I would say to the Leader of the Government that I was not consulted last week. He suggests now that he will consult me, and I welcome that, but last week I was not consulted. The first word I had that the Senate would be reconvening last night was when we sat on Thursday afternoon, and in my opinion there was no justification for that at all. Of course, I know that in the other place the Leader of the Government said there was no method for communicating with the Senate. I would suggest that one was established, but it was not properly used.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, when there is work before Parliament, when there is work for us to do in connection with our task as senators, there is continuing consultation with the other chamber, and the record will show that during the life of this particular Parliament there has been a useful degree of consultation between the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition here. I think that these useful procedures should continue.

Senator Flynn: I admit that there has been consultation occasionally, but unfortunately there is not always consultation. In any event, coming back to the unemployment insurance legislation, I do not think the leader needs to make the motion, because the Chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will want that committee to look at the subject matter of certain bills just as it has on other occasions, and just as other chairmen have done with respect to their committees. I think we can always count on that. But in my opinion there was certainly no reason for sitting last night, and there may well be no reason for sitting next Monday.

Senator Perrault: Only time will tell what important measures will be advanced by the government for the consideration of Parliament. I mentioned the possibility of a pre-study of the unemployment insurance legislation, honourable senators, only to indicate that this measure, along with others, could well provide justification for additional Senate sitting hours in the weeks to come.

Senator Flynn: If we do not consider it in the Senate, it is something else again to consider it in committee.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to pose a question to the Leader of the Government in connection with whether there is a policy being developed to privatize the Canadian National.

A senior officer of Canadian National, Mr. L. L. Atkinson, who is in charge of economics research, made a speech recently at Queen's University in which he said that the CN "should evolve in the direction of becoming part of the private sector." I should like to ask the government leader to assure the Senate that neither the government nor the Canadian National has any intention of selling any equity in CN so as to remove the Canadian National from its critical role as an instrument of national policy, in equalizing economic opportunities in the transportation sector of this very large country.

● (2020)

Senator Perrault: I do not have the text of the honourable gentleman's remarks with me, and so I am unable to comment on his speech. Indeed, it would be unfair of me to do so. However, an inquiry will go forward and the information will be provided as quickly as possible.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

RECONSTITUTION OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, the National Capital Commission was formerly under the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. This ministry having been dismantled, I wonder where a senator or member of the House of Commons might go to ask whether the Special Joint Committee on the National Capital Region is going to be reconstituted?

Senator Asselin: That question has been asked many times before.

Senator Perrault: I am pleased to inform honourable senators that the Honourable André Ouellet, a very able minister, retains the responsibility for the National Capital Commission.

Senator Robichaud: As a supplementary question, honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the Special Joint Committee on the National Capital Region is going to be reconstituted? If this is not the government's intention, I would ask why it is not?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that information will be sought from the minister. The question will be taken as notice.

PUBLIC WORKS AND URBAN AFFAIRS

RESPONSIBILITY FOR HOUSING—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he is going to make a statement at some future date in the house to indicate the responsibility for housing and urban affairs that resides in the new Ministry of Public Works. What responsibility is given the minister to ensure that housing, repairs to housing, and policies on housing are directed to the benefit of the people of Canada?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope to have a statement prepared to indicate the future direction of federal housing initiatives.

Senator Flynn: It is important to know whether the abolition of this ministry is real or not.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in connection with the inquiry that stands in the name of Senator van Roggen dealing with the quite remarkable study on Canada-United States relations made by the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

I should like to ask the leader whether he would invite the Secretary of State for External Affairs to appear in this chamber during the course of the inquiry that I have just mentioned so that he can contribute by way of a response to the excellent work of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, and also assist me with answers to some of the questions I asked last week in connection with the visit of United States Secretary of State Cyrus Vance to Canada?

Senator Perrault: The suggestion is an interesting one, and it should be discussed with the Chairman of the Standing

[Senator Robichaud.]

Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the members of that committee, before any action is taken.

Senator Grosart: It is a silly suggestion.

Senator Flynn: The honourable senator can move that the committee invite the Secretary of State for External Affairs to appear before it.

Senator Perrault: Anything is possible.

Senator Flynn: I am just suggesting a way out for you.

Senator Austin: I appreciate the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition. I wonder whether any senator can honestly say that a suggestion that a minister of the Crown be invited to appear in this chamber on an important public issue is silly.

Senator Flynn: No, I was merely saying you can move that the committee invite the minister. I will second your motion if you need a seconder.

Senator Grosart: It is silly if you don't know how to do it.

TRANSPORT

WINNIPEG—SHERBROOKE-McGREGOR OVERPASS—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Has the Canadian Transport Commission submitted a recommendation to the Minister of Transport respecting the Sherbrooke-McGregor Overpass in Winnipeg?

If that is the case, when was that recommendation made to the minister, and is there any indication as to when the minister might give his views on the matter?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

STATEMENT BY MINISTER—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government to inquire into the basis for the statement made in Regina during the latter part of last week by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the effect that we are seeking to import beef from areas in respect of which our health of animals regulations would have prohibited such imports to date because of problems associated with foot and mouth disease, and that sort of thing. Would the leader inquire whether the minister was expressing his own personal view, or whether that is the policy of the government?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I do not have a copy of the remarks attributed to the Honourable Warren Allmand, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As soon as I am able to speak with him, I will make the appropriate inquiries.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PURPOSE OF VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER TO UNITED KINGDOM—QUESTION

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the government leader whether he can inform the Senate as to the purpose of the visit of the Prime Minister to Her Majesty the Queen and to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom next month.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government and the Right Honourable Prime Minister have had a long, happy and friendly association with the Queen of Canada. I do not have a copy of the proposed agenda at my desk, but I can report that this journey is being undertaken in the spirit of goodwill, affection and loyalty that has always prevailed between Canadians and Her Majesty, and in the spirit of friendship and co-operation that exists between Canada and the United Kingdom.

TRANSPORT

VIA RAIL—QUESTION

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It has to do with this corporation called VIA, about which I keep on asking questions. All of the shares of VIA are owned by the Ministry of Transport. It is regulated by the Canadian Transport Commission. Neither the officials of CN nor CP can tell me what the policies are in respect of VIA.

If you go to bed at night on a CP train, you sleep under CN sheets, with CP blankets. The towels are marked "VIA" and now they are paper towels. There are also linen ones marked "CP" or "CN". When you go to pay for your transportation, you are told by both CN and CP to make the cheques payable to VIA.

Senator Marshall: In American funds?

Senator Riley: Probably American funds or "Newfie" dollars.

Senator Forsey: Order!

Senator Riley: I would like to have some idea as to what the whole policy of VIA is. Even the people in the lower echelons do not know what is going on. The passengers do not know what is going on.

Is it the intention of VIA to encourage passenger travel by rail? I do not see any great public relations effort being made by VIA, or whoever controls it or operates the rolling stock. But it seems to me that they do not control the freight end while they do control the passenger service.

● (2030)

Senator Benidickson: Because it is unprofitable and the CPR escapes the deficit.

Senator Riley: That is it. I think the people of Canada are entitled to know all the details of the policies of VIA as they evolve, and they are evolving very slowly.

Senator Asselin: The question.

Senator Riley: This is a question. I am directing it to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am not attempting to "sidetrack" the honourable senator. However, surely it is an immense order to attempt to provide a definitive reply to the important question which he has asked and which, indeed, is the kind of question which could be answered better if an inquiry were placed on the Order Paper. That would provide an opportunity for many honourable senators to participate in this kind of debate. I cannot present a definitive statement with respect to VIA to the Senate tonight, and I know honourable senators quite understand the impossibility of assuming such a task.

Senator Riley: I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government. Can he bring in a statement from somebody who knows something about the policy of VIA? If we put a notice of inquiry on the Order Paper, and it is debated by senators, where are they going to get the facts to debate with? How are they going to build up their arguments when they do not know anything about what is going on in VIA?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a first step might be for the honourable senator to write to the president of VIA and ask this question. There is also the possibility of obtaining a certain amount of information by placing a written question on the order paper. Again I do not attempt to minimize the importance of the senator's question, but I cannot assume the task of answering detailed questions regarding VIA this evening.

Senator Riley: Who is the president of VIA? Is it the Minister of Transport?

Senator Goldenberg: Mr. Frank Roberts.

Senator Riley: I asked the president of CN once, before a committee, and he could not give me any information as to what the policy was. And the CP officials cannot either, so the only conclusion I can come to is that they do not have a policy except to muddle things up to the detriment of the travelling public. Once again I ask the Leader of the Opposition if he can present the Senate with a policy statement from the person responsible for this.

Senator Flynn: When I change sides I will.

An Hon. Senator: You said "Leader of the Opposition." You meant, "Leader of the Senate."

Senator Riley: Did I? I apologize.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will undertake to present a general policy statement with respect to VIA. However, information sought with respect to the "sheets" and the "meals" and the "silverware" and the "napkins" surely is beyond the ken and competence of anyone in this chamber tonight.

Senator Flynn: Are you sure?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

THE NEW FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—QUESTION

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he would be prepared to make a statement to the house at some early date on the government's policy with respect to the selection of aircraft for Canada's armed forces. I am sure he is aware that the parliamentary statements issued by the government have created considerable apprehension in many quarters and the impression that the choice of military aircraft is not being made on the basis of what Canada requires for her military responsibilities, but rather on the basis of economics and how much work will be created in Canada. I would appreciate if, at an early date, we could have a statement as to precisely what is the government's policy in that matter.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I suggest that there is never total agreement on the part of any group of people in any government or in any military with respect to the type of equipment to be ordered, whether for land forces, the marine forces, or the air forces of this or any other country.

However, I can say, on behalf of the government, that when the final selection of a military aircraft is made, it will represent the substantial majority view of those in the armed forces who will be charged with the responsibility to operate that equipment.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to reinforce the request made by Senator Manning. It seems to me that it would be unwise of us to allow the matter to be settled as has been proposed, because that will be after the event. Surely, if we are to have any impact at all upon this decision, we must take part in the discussion before the decision is made.

I would urge the Leader of the Government to favourably consider the request that we be furnished with a statement on this matter and provided with an opportunity to discuss it and to hear witnesses.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, decisions of this kind are ordinarily taken by governments in consultation with leaders of the armed forces. I have yet to know or learn of any parliamentary committee or any elected or appointed assembly in the parliamentary system which, in the ultimate, solely decides what kind of weaponry is to be purchased by that country for its armed forces. However, I shall communicate the requests of honourable senators to the Minister of National Defence, and I am sure that a statement can be provided for the Senate.

It is not the intention of the government to decide an important equipment purchase by majority vote; indeed, I think it would be irresponsible to do so.

Senator Manning: I should like to add one further comment to clarify the question I asked a moment ago. I am not suggesting for a moment that decisions of this kind can be made by a parliamentary committee, a committee of this house, or any other political group. What I am concerned about, and what I am convinced a good many Canadians are concerned about, is the impression that seems to prevail that the view of the military—the people who should know most about the type of equipment required—is not being given anything like as much weight as the views of those who are looking at this from the standpoint of the cost of the aircraft and how much work it is going to create in Canada.

What I would hope to obtain from the statement by the Leader of the Government is an assurance that the military requirements to discharge Canada's obligations as a nation has first priority in a decision of this kind, over and above those other considerations, important as they may be.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I wish to give my assurance that that is precisely the case. Those who have participated in the long meetings on this subject are aware that the views of the military are accorded major importance.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I must confess that I am still less than satisfied with the reply. I quite agree that this is not an executive body. We will not be making executive decisions, nor do we seek to do so. However, it seems to me that the policy of the government ought to be elucidated here. What is the policy of the government with respect to the kind of aircraft they feel is essential for the defence of this country and to discharge our obligations under NATO?

It seems to me that those matters are relevant and could be discussed here. They might well be the subject of a statement made by the Leader of the Government so that we could be informed as to the policy considerations that lie behind the selection of the aircraft in question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I want to repeat the assurance I gave earlier that I will endeavour to have a statement brought to the Senate after discussing this matter with the Honourable Barnett Danson, Minister of National Defence. I think that honourable senators understand that at least part of any weaponry decision relates to the role that we anticipate these weapons—in this case, aircraft—may, under certain circumstances, be called upon to play in the future. All of that information is not available and cannot be made available. Defence assessments are made at the highest levels and only after careful examination of all the relevant factors respecting possible developments in various areas of the world, possible areas of conflict, and so on. I can only give this assurance, that a transcript of the discussion we have had in this chamber tonight will be provided for the Minister of Defence, and I am sure certain information can be brought to the Senate.

● (2040)

Senator Roblin: I am partially satisfied by that statement, and I thank the Leader of the Government. But I would point out that many of the issues referred to here are now in the public realm. These matters are being discussed at the policy level as to the kind of defence we should be providing for, and what kind of aircraft would be suitable for this country. I agree that we do not wish to be put in possession of confidential information that it is not appropriate for us to hear, but the question of policy with respect to the kind of defence we need surely is another matter and should be elucidated in a chamber like this.

Senator Perrault: Here again, honourable senators, it may be possible at some point to have a Senate debate on the subject of defence policy. There are many initiatives open to the Senate, and to individual senators. A debate of that kind has not been held for some considerable period of time. As I have stated before, questions such as a possible foreign policy debate are matters that honourable senators should consider. It may be very useful for the Canadian people to have that kind of debate in this chamber. Perhaps this is another subject that can be placed on the agenda for the meeting between the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government.

Senator Marshall: In view of the commitment offered, and in view of the sympathy indicated by the Leader of the Government, I wonder if he could direct that a reference be made to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, so that this very important matter can be discussed and debated by both sides?

Senator Grosart: You cannot direct it.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Yes, he can. I hear some sounds on the other side that indicate that this cannot be done. Of course it can be done. All you have to do is turn to page 17 of the Rules of the Senate and read the jurisdiction of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. Certain matters, if there is a motion to the effect, may be referred to that committee, and defence is one of them. So all the Leader of the Government has to do is move that the matter of defence, or some particular matter connected with defence, be referred to the committee. If there is a seconder, and the house adopts the motion, that is all that is necessary.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have committed myself to obtaining a statement from the Honourable the Minister of National Defence one aspect of this important subject. May I suggest that this statement be brought to the Senate, and if honourable senators are not satisfied with the answers, then we can consider alternative steps. And in view of the absence from the chamber this evening of Senator van Roggen, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, I consider that it would be inappropriate to advance that kind of motion at this time.

Senator Roblin: Well, we will wait for your statement.

Senator Grosart: In making that statement, I wonder if the Leader of the Government would be good enough to indicate the steps by which authorization is obtained to expend the very large sums that would be required in this case, and the steps which would be taken to include those expenditures in the votes in the estimates, so that it would be quite clear as to whether Parliament has the right to decide whether these expenditures should be made.

I say this because I was surprised by the statement of the Leader of the Government that this was the kind of expenditure that could be made without parliamentary approval. That was the exact implication in what he said. He stated, as I understood him, that there were kinds of expenditures in the defence sector which could be made without disclosure of information to Parliament. I may be wrong, of course, in my interpretation of what the Leader of the Government said. I now merely ask if he will, in his statement, include a very clear, specific description of the methods by which a specific vote would appear in the estimates to authorize this specific expenditure.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I never suggested that the government could, willy-nilly, plough ahead, spending money without Parliament's authority. I never made any such statement. I did say that the government, like governments throughout the world, does not place in the hands of a parliamentary committee, for disposition by majority vote, a decision as to what kind of aircraft is going to be ordered for defence purposes. Honourable senators are kept fully informed of national developments and anticipated defence expenditures.

The information requested by the honourable senator will be requested in as complete a form as it is possible to obtain it.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill S-5, to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act, which was presented on Tuesday, November 21.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, I think a few words are all that are necessary to explain this report and the bill to which it refers.

The provisions of the bill amend the Canada Business Corporations Act. This is not the first time we have examined and reported on the substance of many of the amendments that are now in Bill S-5. We first had a substantial number of amendments in a bill which was introduced in November 1977. That was Bill S-2 of the last session. The committee considered that bill, heard witnesses, and made a report which was submitted to the Senate in March 1978. The amendments proposed by the committee were substantial in number, and the bulk of them related to the French version of the bill.

● (2050)

In the debate on the motion of the adoption of the report of the committee at that time a full explanation was given of the nature and extent of the amendments proposed, especially those to the French version. The Senate was told of consultations with the committee of the Quebec bar, the Justice Department and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the conferences between the committee and the department in relation to the wording of the French version, and the purpose of the Senate committee, which was to ensure that the language used in the French version was such that an offence different from an offence in the English version was not created.

That report was adopted by the Senate, and the bill was given third reading and sent on its way to the Commons. However, when that session was prorogued, the bill died on the order paper of the House of Commons.

Bill S-5 was introduced in the Senate this fall, and in it we had, first, the amendments which were proposed to Bill S-2 of the last session, and, secondly, proposed new amendments. We now have the report of the committee which contains amendments to Bill S-5, some of which affect or change the language of the original amendments. There is little that is new in these amendments. A few of them are substantial but, in the main, if they are substantial—which is a matter of opinion and judgment—they change, in some instances, specific provisions dealing with certain specified situations into provisions of more general application which would make the law more flexible. Your committee considered that to be both desirable and necessary.

Since the question was asked the other day with respect to its companion measure, Bill S-4, I will say that the amendments to Bill S-5 can be broken down as follows: first, amendments to Bill S-2 of the last session effected by the Senate committee and reflected in Bill S-5, both English and French versions, 20, French versions only, 85; secondly, amendments to Bill S-2 effected by the department and reflected in Bill S-5, both French and English versions, 23, French version only, 88; thirdly, amendments to Bill S-5 effected by the Senate committee, 8.

Therefore, we have a total of 51 amendments to both the French and English versions, and a total of 173 amendments to the French version only.

I am citing this to illustrate the extent to which the committee was involved in its consideration of the bill and the amendments. The actual work in connection with the French version was done, in the first instance, by the Departments of Justice and Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and when objections were taken by members of the Quebec bar, a committee of the Quebec bar agreed to meet to consider those amendments.

The Senate committee delayed consideration of the bill for some considerable time until the Quebec bar's determination of the French version was made and received. Following that, their report on what they thought the French version should be, and what changes should be made, was considered by the Department of Justice, following which representatives from the department appeared before our committee and gave such explanation as they were asked for in connection with the consideration of this question.

The committee felt that the matter had been thoroughly considered and that the members were not setting themselves up as experts on the translation from English into French. The committee felt that the background upon which the French version has been settled is sufficiently reliable to truly express the intent of the English version, and is the best version which, in the circumstances, can be obtained.

I wish to voice a few additional words of caution, namely, that notwithstanding the fact that our committee meetings were well advertised as to dates, et cetera, and that many people who had appeared before the committee when it studied the original bill were communicated with to see whether they had further suggestions to make, additional suggestions are arising all the time. Some were received after the committee had completed its study and examination, and was in the process of drafting its report. A communication went forward to the department in connection with one suggestion, and who knows whether there may be others?

The sequence of events is that a legal adviser of a company contemplating some action which involves consideration of certain sections of the Canada Business Corporations Act will look at them, apply the particular facts that arise, and say, "I am precluded from moving in this fashion by the language of this section, and it is unfair, in the circumstances, having regard for the recoveries that exist in the act, that my client should be debarred." Some of the amendments which we have recommended arose in that fashion, and at least one more that I know of has been received by the department. Some legal advisers discovered, on examination of the pertinent sections of the bill in considering the problems of an agreement which their client was entering into, or proposed entering into, that there were problems that might be generated, and they asked for further consideration.

Your committee decided that the matter had gone far enough, and that there was so much good in the bill that it was time the Senate passed it. The department has carried on discussions, as it should, with a particular legal firm, and to date reports that it is not satisfied that the objections and difficulties presented flow from a consideration of the pertinent sections of the bill. However, the department has indicated that the discussions can continue and, if it is satisfied, it will be prepared to propose an amendment when the bill is being considered by the Commons committee.

In the circumstances, we cannot sit waiting, going from pillar to post, while problems arise which someone wishes the department to solve, passing from an area of doubt to an area of certainty, by making a particular amendment. I think it is time to finalize things, and that is why we decided to continue with the presentation of the report and place the facts before the Senate. Those persons who may be affected, if they can prove to the satisfaction of the department that their case justifies an amendment, are not shut out. The department has indicated to them that it will propose the amendment itself in the other place when the bill gets there.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I simply want to indicate that I agree with the remarks the chairman of the committee has made concerning this bill as well as the bill respecting Canadian non-profit corporations. I suggest that this committee, together with the Department of Justice and the Quebec bar committee have done a great job drafting the French version of this bill.

It was for us quite a new experience to witness the preparation of this version in a context which was quite different from that in which the French version is normally prepared. I am delighted with this experience, which will likely be repeated in the future.

As to the job which was done jointly by the committee, the Department of Justice and the Quebec bar committee, I suggest it was quite useful. Of course, perfection is impossible in this area. Problems will likely occur which will make amendments necessary. Because of the many changes made during this experience, however, some still remain for the committee of the House of Commons which will be delighted to get them.

[English]

Senator Hayden: I think I should say to my friend that I think the attitude of the committee is that it is not necessarily wedded to the old; it is prepared to accept the new where it appears to be useful and persuasive.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Grosart: Would the chairman of the committee care to give the Senate information about the when and where, and perhaps even the why, of the discovery of the apparently 173 inadequacies in the French version? It is rather interesting that here we have a bill drafted and presented to the Senate with these apparent inadequacies. Where, when and why was the discovery made?

Senator Hayden: I think I can explain this to my friend. By simply looking at the statement, it might appear to be, to say the least, confusing that it took so long to discover. However, the larger number of these amendments relate to the French text of the original Canada Business Corporations Act, which was passed in 1975, to which the Senate made many substantial amendments, that were accepted in the other place a hundred per cent. Then criticisms and objections about the adequacy of the French version were raised by members of the Quebec bar.

Remember, even the contemplation of amendments by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was in accordance with an undertaking the department had given to the committee that they would bring up the provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act for review within two years. So they were back to us with amendments, and they decided that this was a proper time to clear up all the objections, even to the French version in the original text. That is an unusual thing in itself, to go back to the original act and rewrite the French version, so the department must have been satisfied that the French version left a lot to be desired in respect of using proper and acceptable language which would adequately convey the intent of the English version, which is what it must do.

Senator Grosart: Of the total of 224 amendments to the bill as it was originally presented, how many would the honourable senator say result from the initiative of the Senate committee? The honourable senator will understand why I am asking that question.

Senator Hayden: I would think that Senator Flynn could very well answer that question, because he made a notable, substantial and useful contribution to the discussion when we were discussing the French version.

Senator Grosart: He is very modest.

Senator Hayden: There was much debate on certain of the terms. However, you have to remember that there were 85 amendments to the French version only in the original Bill S-2, which related to the original act, and there were 88 amendments effected by the department to Bill S-2, which were reflected in Bill S-5, which is the bill we are now dealing with. Of the amendments proposed in committee, none were to the French text. Therefore, I assume that the Department of Justice and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs had been well taught, subject to the scrutiny of such stalwart members of our committee as Senator Flynn and others who are thoroughly familiar with the French version. We think we have done a good job.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Barrow for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented on Thursday, November 23, 1978, on supplementary estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak to the motion at this time. On this side of the house it seems to have become my responsibility to discuss such a motion, but the situation has always arisen that where we have a motion for the adoption of the report of the committee on the estimates we also have the appropriation bill based on those estimates. For that reason I will reserve my comments until the appropriation bill based on these supplementary estimates is before us.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

TWO-PRICE SYSTEM FOR WHEAT—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Leader of the Government in connection with the so-called two-price system for wheat. As he will be aware, for some time now there has been a subsidy to millers in respect of the price of wheat in order to control the price of bread in Canada. Is the leader in a position to deny the story that appeared in this morning's press to the effect that this subsidy is about to be done away with?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take the question as notice. I have read certain press reports too, but I have no official documentation at my desk.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend. Perhaps I might put a supplementary question. If it turns out that this subsidy is to be dispensed with, would the leader please tell the house when this will become effective and what the government's estimate is with respect to the effect on the price of bread?

Senator Perrault: Those details will be provided just as soon as they are made available to my office.

Senator Buckwold: In answering the question of my colleague, Senator Roblin, would the Leader of the Government also indicate the benefits that will be received by western farmers as a result of this subsidy being dispensed with?

Senator Flynn: You need not worry about that.

Senator Perrault: The ultimate reply will be as complete as possible in the government's earnest quest for the full exposition of the facts.

Senator Hays: I have a supplementary for the Leader of the Government. Could we have that reply before 3 o'clock this afternoon?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government is accustomed to working very quickly, but whether that time frame can be met is a moot point.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

HOSPITAL SERVICES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on October 31 last Senator Marshall asked a question of importance to the veterans of the province of New Brunswick. The question was:

Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question about a telegram sent to the Minister of Veterans Affairs by the Northeast Veterans Association of Bathurst, New Brunswick. The association complains that while hospitals to serve veterans have been built in certain areas, none has been built in the northeast part of New Brunswick, and many veterans there find themselves without a hospital bed.

I have taken up this matter with the Honourable Daniel J. MacDonald, Minister of Veterans Affairs, and he has now responded in this fashion:

The agreement between the federal government and the Government of New Brunswick to transfer Lancaster Hospital in Saint John to the province guaranteed the retention of a number of beds for the priority use of eligible veterans. Originally, all these beds were in Saint John, but subsequent discussions with veterans' organizations and provincial health authorities disclosed that the needs of veterans would be better served by providing care closer to their home communities.

In 1977, 57 nursing home level beds were established in Fredericton. This year, in recognition of the needs in northern and eastern New Brunswick, a further 60 beds are scheduled to be reallocated between these areas of the province. The selection of the sites for these beds will be based on the availability of suitable institutions, the concentration of veterans to be served, and their linguistic preferences. The federal and provincial governments will continue to monitor the needs of veterans in New Brunswick, and to redistribute priority beds as the need arises.

And he has asked me to convey a message to all honourable senators, and I quote:

I sincerely appreciate the concern of members of the Senate for the well-being of veterans in New Brunswick.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

VISIT OF U.S. SECRETARY OF STATE TO CANADA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Austin on November 23 with respect to the visit of the U.S. Secretary of State to Canada. That question was answered in part the other day. However, I have some additional information because part of the question was:

... whether any discussions were held with respect to maritime boundaries between Canada and the United States, and in particular whether there is any substance in newspaper reports that Canada has proposed offering a sectoral slice of the Beaufort Sea to the United States in exchange for an equidistant boundary at the Dixon Entrance on the coast of British Columbia.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs and Secretary Vance have reviewed the status of the maritime boundaries and fisheries negotiations with special negotiators Marcel Cadieux and Lloyd Cutler.

The secretary and the minister directed the special representatives, together with the regional and fishery advisers of both countries, to complete the negotiation of the presently unresolved Atlantic coast fisheries details and to refer any remaining differences for resolution at the ministerial level before the year-end.

At the same time they directed the special representatives to continue with their efforts to resolve the remaining three maritime boundary disputes in the Pacific and Arctic Oceans and to conclude a West Coast Fisheries Agreement covering as many of the outstanding issues in that area as can be mutually agreed upon. They also agreed to direct their respective negotiators in the Salmon Interception discussions to endeavour to reach a prompt agreement.

Every effort will be made to have the fishery agreements ratified so as to be in effect during the 1979 fishing season.

As to the specific question with regard to the Beaufort Sea and Dixon Entrance boundaries, no agreement has been reached and no firm commitments have been made on any of the boundary issues as of this moment.

THE SENATE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government, in view of the very heavy burden of work this week—and I am very serious in saying that and I am quite sure that everybody else believes me to be serious—what are the bills the government would like to have passed through both houses of Parliament before the Christmas recess?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope it may be possible after the Senate rises today for the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition to meet on this question and to review and discuss certain matters.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

COMMITMENT BY GOVERNMENT LEADER RESPECTING REPRESENTATIONS BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government has had time to cogitate on the government's commitment of last April to invite certain groups to appear before a standing Senate committee in order to be heard on the amendments to the Canada Labour Code. I put that question two weeks ago and last week I repeated my notice to the leader. I hope I did not disturb his sleep—I mean, of course, his night's sleep—but I did want that information.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: You rarely do disturb my sleep. Honourable senators, we are in the process of arranging our priorities for the weeks and months to come.

Senator Flynn: Months! Hah!

Senator Perrault: The nature of possible committee activities in the coming months is now under consideration. This is a matter I would be most pleased to discuss with the honourable leader this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: I must say I am really worried about the use twice of the word "months".

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

USE FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government which I had intended to put to the Minister of National Revenue last week. But since Senator Guay is no longer the Minister of National Revenue, I have no alternative but to put it to the leader. I do this without hesitation since he is a specialist in all areas anyway.

Senator Grosart: He covers the waterfront.

Senator Flynn: Yes, he covers every field. According to an amendment we made to the Income Tax Act in February of last year, if a person cashing interest or dividend payments does not want to give his social insurance number, the bank will have to withhold 25 per cent of those payments.

At the time I suggested that anyone who refused under those circumstances to provide his or her social insurance number was probably doing so because he or she had something to hide. Such a person was probably guilty of some theft or fraud.

It appeared to me then, and it still appears to me now, that the government was trying not so much to punish a possible theft or fraud as to share in the fruits of such activities. What I want to know today is how much this 25 per cent withholding clause has brought in to the government coffers since it was first imposed, or, if you prefer, how much is the government being paid for its role as an accomplice in the theft or fraudulent handling of securities?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice, but any suggestion that the government is operating with anything less than the highest motives is, I think, repugnant.

Senator Flynn: I may say that when I put the question to the then Minister of Finance, he could not give that kind of reply.

Senator Perrault: An effort will be made as soon as possible to determine the shining truth of the matter.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if the honourable leader in his reply could also indicate whether this requirement of the production of SIN, social insurance numbers, is or is not contrary to undertakings given by the government that such a use of the SIN identification would not be made for this kind of purpose.

Senator Perrault: I do not want to be misunderstood when I say that this government is in support of "SIN." We are in support of the responsible use of social insurance numbers. But the information that the senator has requested will be sought, and I am sure an explanation can be provided.

AGRICULTURE

TWO-PRICE SYSTEM FOR WHEAT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: A few moments ago Senator Hays suggested he would like certain information by 3 o'clock. I hope we have met the deadline.

Senator Flynn: Yes, indeed, for the first time.

Senator Perrault: The Honourable Otto Lang, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, has stated that the floor price for wheat will rise from $3.25 to $4 a bushel. There has been a subsidy for consumers to maintain floor prices at $3.25 a bushel since 1973. I have been informed that the action may save $100 million in subsidies. The action that is being taken is part of the restraint program. It will, it is estimated, put the price of a loaf of bread up a few cents; but wheat, as an ingredient in bread, has remained at the same price for five years. The effect on the consumer price index is approximately .1 per cent. That is all the information I have immediately available.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, in order that I might get it straight, do I gather that the price of wheat to the farmer will go up from $3.75 to $4 a bushel—

Senator Perrault: Three dollars and twenty-five cents.

Senator Buckwold: From $3.25 to $4 as a result of this action? If that is correct it should make the farmers very happy.

Senator Flynn: Was this something that was announced in the other place this afternoon?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I had a message given me only in the past five minutes. Presumably an announcement has been made in the other place.

Senator Flynn: I think that shows an improvement in communications between the two houses.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in order that there might be no misunderstanding about the effect of this on producers, I wonder if the Leader of the Government will clarify that what he is talking about is a floor price, and the fact that the price has been above the floor price for almost all of the five-year period since 1973. The $3.25 has not been effective, and, indeed, moving it up to $4 will have little if any effect on producers' returns, because the selling price is above that even today. However, it provides that the amount of money to buy wheat for domestic flour will now come out of the marketplace rather than from a subsidy made up by the treasury.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I appreciate very much the expert knowledge that Senator Olson has provided.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a further supplementary to make sure that we understand the situation. Does the withdrawal of this subsidy, though it has the effect of saving an amount, which I believe the Leader of the Government said was something like $100 million a year, have the effect also of transferring the cost of that $100 million to the people who buy bread?

Senator Perrault: There will be a slight increase in the per loaf price of bread; but, as I have stated, wheat, as an ingredient of bread, has remained at the same price for five years. The effect on the consumer price index is one tenth of one per cent, not an excessive amount in relation to the rise in price of many other commodities.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I do not think I have received a reply to my question. Perhaps the leader does not wish to answer it. Does this change in the subsidy transfer the cost of the $100 million, which the leader referred to, from the government to the consumers of bread?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have not as yet had a full opportunity to analyze the effect, and it would be irresponsible of me to speculate about the possible ultimate economic impact on consumers and the incidence of the increase.

Senator Croll: It is pretty obvious.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Perhaps I may be permitted another supplementary. Will anyone be affected, so far as the buying of bread is concerned, except those who buy it for food? Is that true?

Senator Perrault: That is not a question.

Senator Smith (Colchester): The honourable the Leader of the Government has indicated that he cannot say whether the $100 million to be withdrawn as a subsidy would have to be paid by the purchasers of bread. He says he doesn't know that. I am now asking a follow-up question. Does anyone have to contribute to the increased cost of bread except those who are going to eat it?

● (1420)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have before me a short announcement provided from the office of the Honourable Otto Lang. I do not have a detailed analysis of the effect of the price increase. For example, I am unable at this time to state whether the increase in the cost of bread may be mitigated as a result of the effects of improved programs—such as increased family allowances—for certain families below certain income levels. It is a complicated question. I do not want to hazard into the “deep” without having all of the facts.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

USE ON MAIL TO ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL OVERSEAS— QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Unfortunately I arrived a little late. It is possible the question has already been dealt with; if so I ask pardon for raising it. I asked a colleague if it had been raised and he thought not.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government could give us any information about the article which he doubtless saw in the Globe and Mail this morning about the use of the social insurance number in the address on letters to soldiers serving overseas, or elsewhere for that matter, I believe. I wonder whether there is any legal warrant for this particular use of the social insurance number, because it seems on the face of it rather odd that if you were sending a letter to a soldier overseas or elsewhere, you would have to put his social insurance number on it as part of the address. Can the Leader of the Government give us any information on this?

Senator Perrault: I have not read the article cited by Senator Forsey. Because of that, I am unable to offer any kind of expert commentary. However, an inquiry will be made of the Minister of Defence.

PURCHASE OF GOVERNMENT GRAIN ELEVATORS—QUESTION

Senator Austin: I have a question for the Leader of the Government. I understand that five grain handling firms headed by the Alberta Wheat Pool and the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool have made an application to purchase the federal government's grain elevator in Prince Rupert. Has the government decided to make that sale to that private consortium?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

Senator Flynn: Are you in favour of it?

Senator Buckwold: I have a supplementary question to that of Senator Austin's. The same situation applies to the government grain elevator in Saskatoon. I have received considerable correspondence from people objecting to this particular development. I am not suggesting that the government is right or wrong, but I should like to obtain a clear statement of the government's reasons for putting out tenders on the government grain elevators that are scattered throughout western Canada?

Senator Austin: I should also make clear that one of the purposes of my question is to determine whether this private consortium might build a grain elevator of its own at Prince Rupert with the help of the Alberta government if the federal grain elevator is not for sale.

Senator Perrault: These questions will certainly be put to the appropriate source in government.

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY PROBLEMS OF INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION IN THE MARKETING OF GRAINS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator McNamara:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture be authorized to examine and report upon the problems of international co-operation in the marketing of grains and other agricultural products; and

That the Committee, or any sub-committee so authorized by the Committee, may adjourn from place to place for the purpose of such examination.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: I yield to the Honourable Senator Roblin.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I thank my honourable colleague for his courtesy in allowing me to continue the discussion of this resolution this afternoon. It seems that this is agriculture day in the Senate, if the Question Period is any indicator. I should like to discuss some of the items which have already been briefly referred to recently.

Perhaps I should start by offering my compliments to the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, the Honourable Senator Argue, for the comprehensive and detailed way in which he reviewed the committee's activities and interests during the past short while.

I was particularly struck by the emphasis that he placed on some problems of western agriculture, particularly the price of wheat. The committee, indeed, did show very marked concern for the development of policy in that connection. The motives for their interests are, of course, reflected in history. They are reflected in the problems that western Canadian farmers have been struggling to solve ever since agriculture began on the western plains. In this world of rather imperfect agricultural marketing competition, the western producer has always been concerned to secure an economic price—indeed, a fair price—for the products of his land and his labour. He sees himself and his industry as being composed of a very large number of relatively small units which have been struggling with costs beyond the control of anyone farming in the west and, in the perception of the western farmer, selling his product in an international market dominated by state purchasing monopolies or, if you don't like that, cut-throat free trading.

The long history of western Canadian agriculture includes, of course, the story of the wheat pools, the Canadian Wheat Board, and the two-price system for wheat whose demise we just celebrated this afternoon. Together with other stabilizing and support measures, they are some indication of those domestic agricultural measures that have been furnished by the farmer, or for the farmer, in dealing with this problem. Of course, in the international field, we have had, on an off-and-on basis, the activities of the International Wheat Agreement.

This is all part of the struggle to obtain economic justice for the western farmer as he perceived his problem. There is no doubt in my mind that the drive that the Senate committee has expressed toward a fair and equitable deal for western wheat in particular, is a basic interest of all Canadians as well as those who are in the western agricultural arena.

The advantages of a healthy agricultural industry in this country are too well known to require a lengthy description by me. One can refer to such obvious instances of its effect by talking about the balance of payments. Agricultural exports of Canada contributed $4.8 billion in the recently concluded year, and that has to help somewhat in a difficult problem. We are accustomed, quite rightly, to look upon agriculture as a source of wealth that is not only basic to our economy as a whole, but stems from a renewable resource, which is one of the great assets of the country. The result of the efforts of the farming people is to fuel a free-spending community, because the people in the west—and this is true of farmers in other parts of Canada—have been ready to buy the products supplied to them by the manufacturers in the rest of this country.

A fair price in the international wheat trade in particular has spin-off effects that affect all of us. It can provide an economic impetus to central Canada and, when the price is right, it can save the public treasury the burden of stabilization and other subsidies which are sometimes called upon. It may be suggested—indeed, I do suggest—that the present drive of the committee in this field of international co-operation and co-ordination in wheat marketing, as Senator Argue described, is a further development in our efforts to get a realistic price for the products of western agriculture.

The world wheat market today presents some interesting features. Only a small portion of the total world production of wheat enters into the international wheat trade. It is estimated, I think, that 70 million tonnes, or approximately 17 per cent of the total world production, passes through the international exchanges. Of that 70 million tonnes, Canada's share is approximately 23 per cent.

Though most of this trade is conducted by state trading organizations, both on the selling side and the buying side, the dominant share of the international wheat market—indeed, the controlling factor in price setting—is that provided by the United States, which was responsible for 43 per cent of the international trade in wheat last year which, as they regard things, is the proportion which is sold on the free market. It is this United States' world wheat trade that provides the price leadership in the world today.

Canadian farmers have seen some international wheat buyers using the system as it exists at the present to what they view as an undue advantage. I refer to the 15 per cent of the total world sales that goes to Japan and the European Economic Community to point out to the house that, in the case of Japan, they are at the present time selling their wheat to their own millers at a price of $9.22 a bushel while paying less than half that on the world market. I refer, too, to the European Economic Community and their common agriculture policy, which is to levy a charge of $3.54 a bushel on wheat that is traded into the community.

So, it has been thought by some that these two authorities, at any rate, could be properly accused of skimming the international wheat market for their own purposes. The state agencies in these jurisdictions mark up the purchase price, as I have indicated, to their own consumers, thus skimming off a very substantial profit. A few years ago—I believe it was in 1973—we saw how the Russian state traders used the United States marketing system to buy enormous quantities of wheat at unrealistically low prices, to the disadvantage of the entire price structure.

One can add to this the fact that it is the surplus of supply or the shortage of supply at the margin that exercises a very profound influence on the price of wheat, either escalating the price or depressing it. A modest change in supply can result in a major change in prices. For example, in 1974 wheat was selling for $6.60 a bushel, and in 1977 it was down to $2.80 a bushel. We have just heard today that the support price of $4 a bushel is somewhat below the price that is being obtained on the market.

I think it is a combination of these factors, and perhaps others, that provides the rationale for the committee's effort to increase what is called the United States loan rate. Part of the price structure in the United States calls for the establishment of a loan rate—which is currently $2.35 a bushel—which has the effect of establishing a price support under the world's wheat market. This arises, of course, from the fact that the United States, with 43 per cent of the export market in its hands, exercises that predominant power in connection with the setting of these prices.

I suggest that we would be somewhat unrealistic if we were to ignore the fact that benefits that might be justified in many respects, as I think perhaps the drive on this occasion is justified, can only be obtained at a price, and perhaps it would be just as well for us to take account of some of the items that might go into a price to Canada if we were to proceed with this measure that is being discussed.

First of all, there is the moral issue. No Canadian farmer relishes being compared to OPEC. A cartel for wheat based on that model is offensive to all of us, to say the least, because we have seen OPEC going for all the market will bear, for being almost careless—and that is perhaps a charitable description—of the hardships and difficulties that they are causing, particularly for people in the less developed countries of the Third World. No one, I suggest, on the committee, or who indeed has the interest of western agriculture at heart, would wish to do that with the world wheat market. So, we have a problem—a problem of finding that mutual ground between producers and consumers which will take us somewhere toward the goal that we seek.

The common ground between producers and consumers is very hard to find if it is divorced from the market. We can see how difficult this question is because the present negotiations for an international wheat agreement seem to have come to a full stop on that very issue, quite apart from the issue of who is going to be responsible for storage. Indeed, one might be pardoned for thinking that a new international wheat agreement may indeed be beyond reach at the present time under current negotiations.

[Senator Roblin.]

But the basic question still stands, and that is: Can the four major world wheat sellers—the United States, Canada, Australia and the Argentine—co-operate to do better? In view of the attitude of the American government as revealed in the visit to Washington, it seems to me that we will probably have to wait until all of the possibilities of a new international wheat agreement have been exhausted before we can find out whether further co-operation between these four big exporters is possible.

If the big four exporters did succeed in taking a united stand and raised the American support for loan level to a higher figure than its present $2.35, there are a number of possible consequences which ought to be considered. We cannot ignore, for example, what will happen to those producers who are not on our team. At what point will higher floor prices call forth greater new production in other lands and, indeed, attract the competition of other edible grains in world wheat markets? These are questions to which, I confess, I have no answers, but it seems to me that they do require some consideration.

What will higher prices do to our own production? Will we have to accept production controls beyond those provided for in the present quota system, which seems to be working quite well? How do we ensure against the problems of over-production—problems that are all too painfully evident in the European Economic Community where, as a result of their common agricultural price system, there are mountains of unsold food, drink, butter, wheat and wine, that have not been disposed of?

We must consider that our American friends may ask something for their contribution toward this effort. Market sharing will probably be a certainty, and there may be other added quid pro quos that might be asked for by the Americans. They certainly cannot be excluded from the debate, because these people are very realistic traders.

Then we have the basic question of demonstrating to the 85 per cent of the world trade, after the Japanese and EEC skimmers, that they are not being victimized, because customers have been known to retaliate if conditions are not fair. Other conditions could be listed, but these are sufficient to indicate the thorny nature of the problem and the necessity to look around widely, taking in all the factors that might bear on our discussion of this important matter.

I think a food strategy for Canada was very well articulated in a recent green paper which, I believe, was presented to some study group under the OECD in which the following principles of policy were set out: first, that we should be seeking a reasonable price to consumers; second, that there should be a fair return to farmers; third, that we should give realistic recognition to comparative economic advantage in the production of food in various parts of the world; and, fourth, that we should be mindful of food for the poor.

It seems to me that if our pricing policies can be articulated within these principles, we can move forward with some assurance. But all in all I come down on the side of the committee. It seems to me that to achieve a successful agreement with a fair shake for exporter and importer alike, a disciplined but reasonable common front between the big four would supply price leadership in this matter, something, I suggest, which is strongly indicated in the circumstances.

Although the Senate committee has struggled—and, I suppose, will continue to struggle—with this concept, I put it to the Senate that we should not only be concerned with the price of wheat, but with the quantity of wheat that we are going to sell on world markets. There was an interesting assessment provided the other day by the Agricultural Division of the World Bank which stated that Canada and the United States were the only major regions capable of supplying reliable expanding volumes of export grains. That is a pretty large statement. I am not absolutely certain as to the complete applicability of this statement to the actual conditions in the world today, but it certainly provides another dimension for the committee to explore. I say that, because the most significant analysis of world demand for all Canadian grains has recently been made by the Canadian Wheat Board.

Dr. H. E. Bjornson, a senior economist of the Canadian Wheat Board, reported last month to the Canadian Grain Council on the prospects of exports for Canadian grain, which is mostly wheat. His statement to that council provides ample food for thought, particularly for a study such as the one under discussion at the moment. Dr. Bjornson has concluded that while Canadian exports for grains today amounts to something around 21 million tonnes, most of which is wheat, the board itself has every reason to believe—and seems to be acting on this belief—that by 1985 the total volume of grain exports from Canada will be increased by some 50 per cent. In the very short period of time of some five years we will be able to export 30 million tonnes of all grains, most of which again will be wheat, compared to the 21 million tonnes that we are exporting today.

This is an astonishing forecast, in my view. If it is true, it is certainly one of the best pieces of news that prairie grain farmers have had for some time. And if it is correct, it is certainly a fact that must be taken into account when considering the pricing system and wheat economics generally.

A 50 per cent increase in the volume of Canadian grains exported in a five-year period, I have to admit, looks optimistic on the face of it, but Dr. Bjornson, I think, makes a pretty interesting case that it may indeed be on the low side rather than the high side. He points out in the last 20 years the level of the world wheat trade has doubled, and the trading in feed grain has quadrupled, so that further growth in the market for these commodities can be confidently expected. And the economic meaning of this possibility, I think, has an enormous prospect for western Canada, and indeed for the nation as a whole. And it is this prediction, this possibility, that I would like the committee to explore in depth when it has the opportunity, because it seems to me that if anything like this should lie in prospect for us, we certainly would want to make sure that we are prepared to take advantage of the opportunity.

I would like to see how western Canadian agriculture can prepare itself to make sure that if this marketing opportunity comes about, and if the productive possibilities are sufficient to support it, it makes the most of the chances as they come.

I think I can suggest to this house, without any exaggeration, that with respect to one aspect of grain marketing, if in no other, we clearly must do very much better than we have been doing in the past several years, and I am talking, as I suppose honourable senators will recognize, of the way in which we transport and handle the export grains that are moving into world markets. In the last period, 1977-78, we exported 16 million tonnes of wheat, and 5.1 million tonnes of other grains, giving a total export trade in the year that has just closed of 21.1 million tonnes. Now some people have been asking why we have not done better. Why did we not also export the other considerable quantities which had been sold, and for which markets were available but which, for some reason or other, we could not bring into an export position. At the present time it seems that 21 million tonnes is the maximum quantity that our transportation and marketing system is capable of moving into an export position. Certainly this seems to be the case as things are organized at present. Last year we actually deferred delivering of 1.5 million tonnes—that is, in the export year that has just closed. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that it was not deferred, but was completely lost, because I doubt that the effect will be an effective deferral; the effect will be an actual loss.

In the same speech to which I am referring, Dr. Bjornson made another very interesting statement when he said that if transport had been available we could have sold in the last year 25 million tonnes instead of the 20 or 21 million tonnes that were actually moved. Now this increase of 20 per cent is certainly a substantial amount. It would add some half a billion dollars to the gross intake from the sale of this commodity, and it would certainly have a remarkably helpful effect on our balance of payments, to say nothing of the money that it would put into our economic system, and the economic stimulus it would provide.

So when you think of that figure, a forecast of 30 million tonnes by 1985, or a 50 per cent increase over the current year, it does look like a reasonable prospect and a reasonable possibility. And with that opportunity before us, the question to which I would like the committee to address itself is: Can we produce and can we sell these quantities, and if we can, can we move them to the buyer? This, indeed, becomes the critical factor in the equation.

To achieve increased grain sales, it seems apparent that we must improve the capacity of our transportation system to put grain into export position. And yet, it has been reported to me that for the last 26 years, from 1952, no new grain service equipment has been put in place by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I am not sure what the Canadian National Railway has been doing. I also have a piece of information here to the effect that in the last six years the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway removed 18,000 cars from grain service, and as a result of that we have a catch-as-catch-can ad hoc policy being followed by the Government of Canada at the present time because they bought 8,000 hopper cars in the last year or so. And now we see an entirely new departure of policy in which the Canadian Wheat Board is reported to be seeking to buy from 500 to 2,000 hopper cars itself, which will cost from $20 million to $80 million if we reckon costs at $40,000 per car.

Here again, to my mind, we have the problem of a rather disorganized approach to the problem at hand. I am not altogether sure that it is a question of grain cars that is at the root of our difficulty. There are some who say it is not. Some say that if they were better organized they could do the job. That is something I would like to look into. But I do know that although a number of terminals, some old terminals, have been modernized and enlarged and have changed management and have changed ownership, except for one terminal in North Vancouver, not one new terminal has been built in western Canada since 1942, and that is 36 years ago. Yet it is alleged, and as far as I know it is correct, that new terminal capacity is perhaps our most badly needed facility, particularly on the west coast. It seems so odd to me that the government should be concerned with who is going to own and operate the terminals at Prince Rupert when they might be addressing themselves to more important problems like how we are going to get some more terminal operating space there. Perhaps there is an argument to be made that it would be better for those who are interested in buying the terminals to be persuaded to build some new ones, or for the government to do the same thing in their place.

These are facts in connection with our transportation system which I think need to be validated. They need to be interpreted so that we can be sure of exactly what they mean. I suggest to this house that part of the problem I am trying to describe has been very succinctly set out in the report of the Snively Commission, which recently tabled its findings. The Snively Commission was established to decide the economic facts with respect to the cost of moving grain under the statutory rates in western Canada, and their findings are, I think, of some significance.

In the year that has just passed, the Snively Commission reported that it cost $354 million to move grain under the statutory rates in western Canada. Of this large sum, the federal government paid $64 million or 18 per cent, the farmers in their freight bills paid $150 million or 32.4 per cent, and the railways paid $175 million or 49.6 per cent, which is about one-half. This surely must cause us to pause and consider the run-down lines that we have in western Canada—which are inadequate to handle the hopper cars in many instances—and the lack of proper terminal facilities and other matters connected with the movement of grain, and ask ourselves whether there is any relationship between this division of the cost of carrying grain under the statutory rates and the situation we have in mind.

In this connection I am reminded of the repeated statement of the Minister of Transport to committees of this house in which he said it was the policy of the government to reimburse the railways for non-compensatory rates that arose because of national policy mandated by the government. I wonder whether this means that the railways are going to get $175 million next year as an extra subsidy for moving grain. I would be interested to know. There might be other measures that could be suggested to bridge this financing gap, and it is certainly a matter that is going to be of considerable interest to the Canadian public in the coming months.

Why are we not selling all we can? It is because we have an unreliable transport system, and that has prejudiced not only sales during the present year, as I have mentioned, but it is also damaging to Canada's reputation as a dependable grain supplier in the future. If the forecast of the Canadian Wheat Board is right, the world grain trade challenges us to sell more, indeed, just to retain our current market share. The opportunity is there for a 50 per cent increase in Canadian sales of grains by 1985, which in terms of today's dollar and last year's price structure would add between $1 billion and $1½ billion to the income of prairie farmers. When one considers what this increase in gross income might do to assist our balance of payments problems—which I predict will get worse rather than better, unfortunately—and what it would mean in terms of economic stimulus in the manufacturing centres of eastern Canada and elsewhere, it seems to me that the size of the goal and the attraction of the forecast are obvious.

I hope, therefore, that the committee will proceed with its work on prices. I also hope that it will take up the challenge with respect to production and transportation. I hope it will make up its mind on whether Canada can provide a 50 per cent increase in grain exports during the five years from 1980 to 1985, and that it will make up its mind on whether that market is a probability we should be working for, and that it will make up its mind on whether or not that grain can be produced and sold and whether it can be transported to export positions.

The prospect for one of Canada's great and renewable natural resources is much brighter with this in mind, and that prospect underlies the fact that western Canada has still an important contribution to make to Canadian growth and prosperity and helps confirm the role of western agriculture as one of the great engines of Canadian economic expansion and growth. The increase in grain exports will supply enormous benefits to every part of the Canadian economy.

Honourable senators, these are the reasons why I hope you will approve Senator Argue's resolution, and will instruct the committee to continue its work in that direction.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to speak briefly on the motion before us, because it does open up for discussion a wide range of matters involving the international grain trade, transportation, and all of the other considerations that flow therefrom.

I will confine myself to the motion that the Agriculture Committee examine and report upon the problems of international co-operation in the marketing of grains. At the outset, I offer my sincere congratulations and commendations to the members of the committee, and especially to the Chairman, Senator Argue, for the work the committee has done, particularly during the last ten months, specifically on the matter of international co-operation as stated in this motion.

There are three reasons for these observations. I suppose the first and foremost is the potential economic benefit that can flow from the activities of this committee to the producers of grain in western Canada. The second, and equally important, reason, if we are to take seriously some of the criticisms levelled at this chamber and its members recently, is that this committee is one of the most visible activities of the Senate. I would venture to say that at the moment Senator Argue is one of the best known senators in all of western Canada. If you look at the press releases having to do with the activities of this committee, you will see what I mean. They are voluminous both in terms of this inquiry into international grain marketing and in terms of the activities of the committee in the Kent County area of New Brunswick, as well as in terms of the committee's inquiries into the beef industry. I repeat that I think it fair to say that Senator Argue and his committee are better known to the public than perhaps any other member or activity of the Senate.

In that vein I have here a sheaf of newspaper clippings which is quite thick, but which represents only 10 per cent of what I have in my office of press reports on what Senator Argue's committee has been doing over the past year. It is no exaggeration to say that Senator Argue and his committee have been prominent in the public eye, their activities being described on the front pages of the two largest agricultural papers in western Canada, the Western Producer and the Monthly Report, formerly called the Free Press Weekly, which is put out by the Winnipeg Free Press. That Senator Argue has been able to accomplish this is in itself, I think, a great tribute to the man.

I believe I have the support of the members of this house on both the government side and the opposition side when I say that Senator Argue has demonstrated beyond any doubt that he and his committee have done a great deal of hard work on particular problems, and that they have put to the best possible use the limited resources available to them.

Just what was the problem that Senator Argue and his committee undertook to examine with respect to international co-operation in the grain marketplace about ten months ago? As Senator Roblin has pointed out, there was a misunderstanding between Canadian producers and United States producers and, in some cases, between Canadian policymakers and American policymakers. It is pretty clear from the conversations and meetings that took place between Canadian senators and American senators that not only did the American producers not understand how the Canadian system of marketing works, but neither did the policymakers or the administration in the United States understand how the Canadian Wheat Board marketing system is supposed to work. More particularly, they did not really believe that Canada could give a commitment, or have the tools in place to keep that commitment, with respect to the marketing of grain, particularly in respect of its being in competition with what they wanted to do.

I am sure that senators will agree that the grain officials in this country could talk to the senior grain officials in the United States, and that that would help to some extent. But it is also important, both for Canada and the United States, that the agricultural producer organizations in the United States fully understand the system that operates in Canada so that they can have the confidence that is necessary for them to enter into a co-operative arrangement with this country knowing that we will keep our part of the bargain. At the moment they simply do not understand our quota system and the controls that the Canadian Wheat Board has on the quota system here. Nor do they understand that in respect of wheat export, the Canadian Wheat Board is the sole marketing agency. If they understood that, they would know that when a commitment is made that commitment can be met by the Canadian Wheat Board in its offering and sales policy.

The discussions that went on between the senior officials on both sides of the border might have led to some understanding on the part of those senior officials, but I doubt that that understanding radiated out to the producers. What is more, I doubt that the United States would accept an attempt on the part of our senior grain officials to educate producers in the United States, or to publicize our system in their country.

However, there was no resentment. When Senator Argue invited American senators to Winnipeg to discuss these problems, those overtures were welcomed, because there had been some discussions going on before that, and senators on both sides had recognized that there was a problem. As a matter of fact, I understand that Senator Argue is now in Oklahoma at the invitation of a senior senator there and a state association of grain producers, and tomorrow he is to go to Texas at the invitation of a grain producing organization there, to explain our position in this matter.

What I am about to say now follows a little on what Senator Roblin has said. The specific problem that arose was that the United States loan level was too low. But there was a time in last March, April and May when the loan level set by the United States administration was, in fact, the major determining price for all the international grain trade, including Canada's.

● (1500)

The reason is very simple. Canada had committed itself to the limit of its capability to deliver to export position, and the same was true with almost every other major exporting country. They were unable to accept any further commitments because their capability was already fully utilized. Therefore the only country in the world where there were both supplies of grain and capability to deliver it was the United States. Yet they were selling it, as Senator Roblin pointed out, at something over $2.35 a bushel, or near that figure, because that was the effective loan level. A producer had the alternative of either selling it on the open market or he could take a loss. So it was sold. The fact remains that their producers could be paid up to the target price, which is 75 cents a bushel more, provided it went into the loan. So the United States treasury had to make up that difference.

In Canada we have had, for domestic consumption only, a partial two-price system—I guess we did up until 3 o'clock today. I am not too concerned about the announcement that was made because I do not think it will change the return to producers—at least, not in the immediate future. The point is that if the United States administration had been persuaded it was to their advantage to raise the loan level by 70 or 75 cents a bushel, it is the opinion of informed senior people in the grain trade that it would have increased the world price from that very depressed level to something around $3 per bushel.

It would not have changed the volume, which has an important effect on prices. It is our opinion, and the opinion of the committee, that it would not have changed the volume. It would not even have changed or readjusted the share which Canada and the United States had during the period from sometime early last winter until the new crop came in this fall.

There was another important factor involved in all of this, namely, the balance of payments insofar as the United States is concerned. Honourable senators will realize that if this grain was being sold at a level below the so-called target price in the United States, or what producers had the right to expect, then the United States treasury made up the difference. According to estimates provided by the committee, the United States' share for a full year would have been about $3 billion.

There was not only acknowledgment from the United States that they had a major balance of payments problem that affected their dollar and other things, but there was also an acknowledgement from the Japanese and Germans that they ought to do something to relieve the severe balance of payments problems which the United States had. Here is a clear case of where, by increasing the price by about 75 cents a bushel, those two areas would have played a major part. I am referring to the European Economic Community and Japan. A major part of those balance of payments deficits could have been made up.

I do not wish to go into a whole lot of detail about what the future holds, or about what we could or should do, but I consider it useful to support what Senator Roblin has said about the limiting factor being our capability to deliver grain to export position.

A story appeared in the Globe and Mail, I believe, this morning to the effect that the Canadian Wheat Board had withdrawn from the Japanese tender for the month of January simply because it does not have the capability to deliver in the event that Japan took them up on any of those offers. In other words, our capacity to deliver to export position is full, so we have withdrawn from the market, or at least the potential market, for the month of January.

It is a pretty sad commentary on the whole system when we realize that even when our marketing and delivery system is running completely to capacity, and could run over capacity, we have to put up with prices that are below the cost of production. Prices have backed up a little now, and I suppose that some would say they are near the cost of production, but overall, if we add the increased costs which have occurred as a result of inflation during the past 12 to 24 months, the farmers' return from the international market is still slightly below the cost of production. I acknowledge that it has improved, but it is a long way below the cost of production of only a few months ago.

The argument has been advanced that prices can be set simply on the basis of supply and demand. When the demand is well over supply then surely the price should go up. But it has not, and that leads us to the obvious conclusion that Canada, by itself, does not set the price. We have never pretended that we did. We do not have enough muscle, if you like, in the scheme of things to establish market price in wheat, and therefore this international cooperation for which Senator Argue and his committee are asking is a very useful thing in terms of the interests of Canada and, particularly, the grain producers.

I would conclude by suggesting that we encourage the committee, and especially the chairman, because, in my view, he has done a very good job—in fact, an outstanding job—by any comparison one might wish to make, for western producers.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: We should also acknowledge that he has done a very good and useful job so far as the Senate's image is concerned.

I hope that honourable senators will not only support this motion, but that they will also provide Senator Argue with the resources he needs to do the kind of job he has demonstrated he is both capable of doing and willing to do. I will not go into details, but there have been times when he could have used a little more financial and other support to carry on the activities of the Agriculture Committee. The results of the committee's activities speak for themselves. Whether or not the committee is well known in central Canada, Ontario and Quebec, I am absolutely confident that in the west its activities are far more visible than any other activity of the Senate.

• (1510)

In conclusion, honourable senators, I ask you to support this motion and enable the Agriculture Committee to carry on its useful work.

Senator Bosa: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question. What is the cost of production of wheat?

Senator Olson: The cost of production is calculated by means of a very complex formula. I do not have it with me, but the Western Grain Stabilization Act requires that a cost of production factor be established, and that it be used in respect of the cash flow of farmers, whether they agree with the factor or not. By the way, there was a fairly substantial payment made out of that fund in the spring, and again in October. As I said, I do not have the formula with me, but it is available to the Chairman and members of the committee.

Senator Bosa: I do not wish to appear unsympathetic to the farmers, but if wheat is sold at a price below the cost of production—and up until a few months ago beef cattle were sold at prices below the cost of production—I wonder how they make a living.

Senator Olson: They live on their capital. When that capital runs out, they go broke. There are thousands of examples of this in the country, not only in grain farming but in other types of farming. If prices stay down too long, they simply fold up, sell out, and join the unemployment ranks in the cities. Farmers, obviously, have a little more time because they have a capital investment in their land, livestock and machinery. They can usually borrow against those assets for a while. When a farmer goes broke, though, he goes with a bang. When he is in so deep that he cannot pay any more, the banks close in on him. I would expect, even at today's prices which appear high to consumers, that there are hundreds, perhaps thousands, of beef producers who need at least five years of those prices to catch up on the debt they accumulated while selling at below the cost of production.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I missed my opportunity to ask a question of Senator Roblin. I wonder if I could have consent to ask that question now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Benidickson: I should like to preface my question by saying we are fortunate in having as members of this chamber a former Premier of a western province, and a former federal Minister of Agriculture. I have not heard a better discussion of transportation problems with respect to western grain in a long time.

May I also say that I had the discomfiture for six years, simply because I was Prairie-born and the most westerly member of the official opposition from 1957 to 1963, to be the so-called official opposition critic with respect to international wheat agreements and, generally, with respect to western agriculture. I felt very uncomfortable and apologetic in that role because I had little expertise.

My understanding is that historically and logically it would be the responsibility of the railways to provide rolling stock and satisfactory service to move western grain products. I know there has been some recent departure from that. An example of this would be the matter of hopper cars. Is this another move of a different nature to which Senator Roblin referred, if the Wheat Board itself, but to the charge of its clients, the western producers, is going to volunteer to foot the bill for the supply of cars for the moving of western grain?

Also, was the supply of hopper cars, which is a fairly recent development, charged to the taxpayers and the general revenues of Canada through the Department of Transport, and is this reference to a Wheat Board purchase of grain rolling stock something new and different again?

Senator Roblin: I have not seen any public document which sets out the principles by which the Wheat Board would get into the hopper car business, so I cannot really answer the question from personal knowledge. I rather fancy, though, that it is the counsel of desperation, because the Wheat Board has been supremely conscious of the fact that they could have sold more wheat last year. According to one of their estimates, they could have sold five million tonnes, or 20 per cent, more than they actually sold. If one is in the selling business and sees sales of this nature escaping—and Senator Olson has given us a fascinating example today of how this is going now with the problem of the Japanese bid—one can understand just how the Wheat Board feels. I think it is the counsel of desperation.

I must warn members of the Senate that that is purely a subjective opinion of my own. It may not be rooted in fact, but it is the best guess that I can give at the present time.

Senator Benidickson: I suppose Senator Roblin has seen the Commons Hansard of yesterday, and read that the Minister of Agriculture said that the Canadian Pacific Railway declined the government's offer to participate in the rehabilitation of 1,000 grain-handling cars. The particular exchange is to be found on page 1559 of yesterday's Hansard.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for bringing this to my attention. Frankly, I did not see the statement, but it does not surprise me in the slightest. We have seen a minimum of co-operation, from my point of view, on the part of both railways with respect to facing up to this problem. We have had many complaints about grain cars being left to molder on the sidings in various places in western Canada when, according to the view of some, they could have been put into service.

As I said in my speech, there is some argument as to whether the shortage of cars is the problem or whether there are other problems as well. It seems to me that we are in a chaotic position. We don't know the facts—at least, I don't know them—about western transportation problems and where the bottlenecks are. I can only assume that conventional wisdom is right, and that the difficulties are in the boxcar situation and the terminals. It is hard to understand how an invitation to move grain, when extended to the two railways, can be refused in a manner which seems to be lacking any logical support.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, my intervention in this debate will be brief. In the first place, I support the motion and agree with Senator Olson and others who have said that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture has done an outstanding job.

The purpose of my intervention is not to comment on the issues that Senator Roblin and Senator Olson have raised, but to raise an additional one. I had the opportunity to be in southeast Asia in October, a visit which concurred with a visit of the United States Secretary of Agriculture to China. It was a very high-powered visit from the point of view of the United States Government. I heard talk from China watchers at the southeast Asia meetings that I attended that the United States-grown wheat to China, and I was asked—and I pass the question along to those who are experts in the area of the grain trade—What will that do to a very valuable market which Canada has held for many years?

The United States, as honourable senators are aware, is the producer of more than half of the wheat that finds its way into the world's export trade. Canada's share is a good deal smaller than that although, of course, it is a significant trade item for us.

I would hope that the committee, if it is empowered by the Senate to consider friendly co-operation in these matters, will look at that friendly co-operation that is so important to the maintenance of our traditional China market.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, December 5, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to give an explanation of next week's business. In moving the adjournment of the Senate to Tuesday evening, we have taken into consideration that Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, which we had thought would come to the Senate this week, has not yet passed in the House of Commons. We do expect to have Bill C-10 by Tuesday. We might have sat on Tuesday afternoon, but with the heavy committee schedule for that day this would not be feasible. When these committees were set down, it appeared that we would be sitting Monday evening and Tuesday evening next week, leaving all day Tuesday for committees.

On Tuesday evening we will proceed with the second reading of Bill S-10, to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement, and hopefully also with Bill C-10. The supply bill covering supplementary estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending 31 March, 1979, should pass in the Commons next Thursday night, December 7. It could very well be necessary for the Senate to sit on Friday, but this cannot be determined until some time next week when we see how the work progresses and what may come from the other place.

As I mentioned before, the committee schedule for next Tuesday is heavy. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. to hear witnesses on the subject matter of Bill C-15, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1978. The Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline will meet at 10 a.m., and the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution will meet in camera at 10.30 a.m. and 2 p.m.

The Health, Welfare and Science Committee will meet at 10 a.m. on Tuesday to commence its advance study of the subject matter of Bill C-14, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971. The Health, Welfare and Science Subcommittee on Childhood Experiences will meet at 4 p.m. The Transport and Communications Committee will meet at 8.30 p.m. to continue its consideration of Bill S-6, Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979. The Retirement Age Policies Committee will meet at 2 p.m., and the National Finance Committee will meet at 2.30 p.m. to consider the DREE estimates.

On Wednesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. and again at 2.30 p.m. to continue its consideration of the subject matter of Bill C-15, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1978. The Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee is planning to meet when the Senate rises to deal with Bill S-9, the Fugitive Offenders Act, should that bill have been referred to it. The Agriculture Committee has arranged to meet when the Senate rises.

On Thursday the Retirement Age Policies Committee will meet at 9 a.m.; the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-15; the National Finance Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. to consider the DREE estimates, and the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 11 a.m.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I may have missed it, but does the list of meetings include one for the Transport and Communications Committee, which was authorized to take place on Tuesday night while the Senate is sitting?

Senator Petten: It was mentioned, senator, yes.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the outline of committee work indicated that the Pipeline Committee meeting, to be held on Tuesday at 10.00 a.m., will be held in camera. That is correct, of course, because the committee will be considering a report to the Senate. However, two witnesses have been invited to come back, and if they accept the invitation that part of the meeting will obviously be open and will be reported.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY

AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA ON THE PRICE OF OIL AND GAS— QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government to try to clear up some confusion that appears to exist in the press with regard to a new or amended agreement between Alberta and Canada respecting the date for increasing oil prices. Has a new agreement, or an amended agreement, or a postponed feature in the present agreement, been concluded between the Government of Canada and the Province of Alberta?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am unable to confirm that report at this time.

Senator Olson: A supplementary question. Are there other significant factors, not particularly related to the price of crude oil but to the expansion of gas markets into eastern Quebec and the maritimes, that are all part of the new package agreement?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a number of options are now under study, but it is not possible for me to comment today on this subject.

Senator Olson: A further supplementary question. There seems to be at least one official confirmation that a new arrangement has been reached between the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Honourable Alastair Gillespie, and the Alberta Minister of Energy and Natural Resources, the Honourable Donald Getty, with respect to the dates and other factors involved. It seems to me that we should have official confirmation of this, because if it is true, then it may be that Quebec and Maritime Pipeline Ltd. would like to amend its application to the National Energy Board now that the federal government has apparently already agreed to it. I wonder if the leader could give us an undertaking to clear this up as soon as possible because of the very important changes that will flow from this agreement if these reports are correct.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government is aware of the implications, and, of course, the matter has been under discussion. I can only give the commitment that, as soon as it is possible for me to make a statement on the subject, that information will be conveyed to the Senate.

● (1420)

Senator Olson: A final supplementary. Could the Leader of the Government indicate when that announcement will be made?

Senator Perrault: I have no further information at this time.

PUBLIC WORKS AND URBAN AFFAIRS

RESPONSIBILITY FOR HOUSING—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I asked a question of the Leader of the Government on Tuesday last with respect to housing and urban affairs. I am surprised that I have not yet had an answer. My question concerns low rental housing for veterans, and additional benefits provided veterans under the Assisted Home Ownership Program. These are important matters for veterans, so I would appreciate any information the leader can provide on this subject.

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

USE ON MAIL TO ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL OVERSEAS— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Forsey asked a question yesterday with respect to the alleged use of social insurance numbers on mail to armed forces personnel overseas. I have been informed by the Minister of National Defence that the social insurance number does in fact replace the old regimental number on overseas mail addressed to armed forces personnel. It is required for overseas mail and for ships at sea because of the great difficulties experienced if there is not specific identification.

The Minister of National Defence stated yesterday, and I quote:

We may have a number of "Al Jones" on a ship or in a Middle East force. It is necessary in that system: it is my understanding that it is not required for any base in Canada.

He went on to say:

It seems to be a logical application of the social insurance number as a replacement for the regimental number of the past. It is for easy identification.

And he also said:

—I have had no complaints from those in the service with reference to this matter.

Senator Rowe: If I might ask a supplementary, does the Leader of the Government know whether the use of the social insurance number in that respect was made with the individual or collective approval of the members of the armed forces?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I cannot at this time give the genesis of the concept. Inquiries will be made.

USE FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I note that the Leader of the Government did not answer my supplementary in respect of the use of the social insurance number, which dealt with whether such uses of SIN identification were in accordance, or otherwise, with assurances given by the government that this kind of use would not be made.

Perhaps the leader has not had time to find an answer, but I think it is essential that we have an answer as to whether this and other uses that are being made of the social insurance number are contrary to the clear assurances made at one time, if my recollection is correct, by the government.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if Senator Grosart would care to bring to the Senate the instances in which the government has said that the social insurance number would not be used for this purpose, I would be pleased to have that information and that evidence, which would then be conveyed to the appropriate minister, together with an inquiry. However, I know of no commitment ever given by the government that social insurance numbers would not be used for this purpose.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps the Leader of the Government, instead of asking me to obtain the evidence, would inquire of the appropriate authorities whether such assurances were ever given. I think that is a proper question for me to ask.

Senator Perrault: Additional inquiries will be made of the Minister of National Defence. However, it is not the practice of the government to engage in illegalities. I feel confident that there will be no evidence produced to indicate that this is an illegal action.

Senator Grosart: By way of clarification, I made no charge or suggestion that it was an illegal action. I was careful to use the phrase, on both occasions, "contrary to assurances given."

Senator Smith (Colchester): It's just a broken promise.

Senator Grosart: I am quite sure, as Senator Smith has said, it was just a broken promise. There have been broken promises in the record of governments, including this one.

AGRICULTURE

TWO-PRICE SYSTEM FOR WHEAT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday the important question of wheat and bread prices was raised, and I have received additional information today. With respect to the impending amendments to the two-price wheat act, scheduled for tabling in Parliament, it is important to stress certain aspects of the amendments. The amendments will convert the original subsidy system of protection for farmers to a guaranteed floor price of $4 per bushel for wheat sold for food use in Canada so as to cover their costs of production. Consumers will also benefit from protection against any extreme rises in world wheat prices by the $5 maximum millers will pay even when the world price exceeds $5.

In this way the farmer knows what his minimum is going to be regardless of world fluctuations, and millers know that their price range is controlled within the $4 to $5 price band.

Federal spending will be cut by $100 million under the legislation. Thus, after the bread increase in January, which could run from five cents to seven cents a loaf retail, consumers can expect a stable consumer price.

As the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board and chairman of the grains group, the Honourable Otto Lang, states:

We are most reluctant to see this price increase in bread. However, this whole pricing framework was becoming seriously distorted in the wheat chain and sooner or later we had to face the facts.

It is pointed out that the forthcoming adjustments in guaranteed income and other assistance programs, as I suggested yesterday, will help lower income Canadians and pensioners in the coming year.

Government officials have met with the milling industry and have an undertaking from them that they will use up existing stocks of wheat at the current prices and not pass on the new costs until January of 1979.

The Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity is being asked to keep an eye on the prices of all bakery products for the next few months and report on any unusual mark-ups.

Under the old system, millers paid a straight $3.25 per bushel for number one wheat for Canadian consumption regardless of the world price. Farmers were paid the difference between the millers' price of $3.25 and the world price. However, in the view of the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, this was becoming increasingly unrealistic.

First, farmers' production costs exceed $3.25 per bushel and have done so for several years. Also the costs of subsidy to make up the world price differential was becoming exceedingly heavy. As Mr. Lang states:

It was apparent it was time to review the two-price system as originally drafted and try to retain the essential elements of protection and guarantee but place it on a more realistic financial footing.

[Senator Grosart.]

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF MANUFACTURED GOODS—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In view of the dramatic increase in the price of manufactured goods, an increase which is attributed not to the costs of production but to marginal increases in the profits of the manufacturers, does the government intend to do anything in this area?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has indicated his continuing concern with allegations of inordinate profits made by certain companies. However, I have listened with interest to statements made by certain critics of the government, some of whom, for example, speak of "40 or 50 or 60 per cent increase in profits over last year," but fail to make any mention at all of what the alleged profit represents in terms of a return on invested capital. A number of factors are very important in attempting to assess whether certain companies, as some allege, are burdening the consumer with inordinately high prices.

Senator Bosa: It has been intimated that these increases dissipate the advantages that we have derived through devaluation of the dollar and our competitive position vis-à-vis the market outside of Canada.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator has made a valuable point. I can give an assurance that the situation is being closely monitored. However, as I said earlier, there have been some irresponsible statements made by certain groups in this country about the profit situation. For example, I remember that a few years ago reference was made to an alleged corporate rip-off in this country; statements were made concerning allegedly huge percentage increases in profits by certain corporations over the previous year, when in fact some of the corporations had been in virtually loss positions the previous year. All statistics have to be analyzed very carefully and responsibly. This is the endeavour of the government.

Senator Bosa: Would the Leader of the Government make this information available to honourable senators so that they have a proper perspective on this issue?

Senator Perrault: Certainly the minister responsible will be asked for information on the subject, which can be provided for the Senate.

Senator Olson: Would the leader take into account the reports of several chartered banks last week, which report an increase in profits of anywhere from 30 to 40 per cent from a year ago, which was also a satisfactory profit year?

Senator Perrault: That area is always part of any investigation or monitoring by the government. The concern of the honourable senator will be brought to the attention of the appropriate minister.

TRANSPORT

TRAIN SERVICE BETWEEN NEW BRUNSWICK AND MONTREAL— QUESTION

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. There are persistent rumours that the train schedule between Saint John and Western New Brunswick and Montreal is to be changed in order to eliminate the convenience of the present schedule. The present schedule brings the people of Saint John, western New Brunswick and southern Quebec into Montreal at 8 o'clock in the morning, where they can spend their day doing their business and shopping, and then return, leaving Montreal at 6 o'clock in the evening. The rumour is that it is the intention of VIA, or the operating agency, to turn this train into a day-nighter.

Senator Forsey: Good God!

Senator Riley: That is, it would leave Montreal at 12 o'clock midday, arrive in Saint John at 12 midnight and return at similar times the next day. This would eliminate all the benefits the people of this area presently have from this passenger service.

I consider this question urgent, because the rumour is that the change will probably take place early in the new year, and I would anticipate, because of lack of promotion by CPR, VIA, CNR or whatever body is involved, that they are going to say the passenger service is not used to any great extent. Let me add, in anticipation of the answer, that this is only because of the fact that there has been no promotion of the service. Advertising and public relations people have not been drumming up business for it. It would be nice to have an answer so that before we are raped we can prepare to defend ourselves.

Senator Perrault: I take that question as notice.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF BREAD—QUESTION

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that there are conflicting newspaper reports regarding the increase in the price of bread brought on by the elimination of the subsidy to the wheat farmers, could the Leader of the Government direct an inquiry to the Minister of Agriculture to obtain from his nutrition section a recipe for making bread out of potato flour? If the people in the maritime provinces were able to convert potatoes into flour and make bread from it, it would give them the chance to counteract at least to some extent the increase in the price of bread, which, according to news reports, will rise from five cents to twelve cents a loaf.

Senator Flynn: What kind of subsidy would you need?

Senator Perrault: In respect of bread prices, the minister has estimated that a fair increase in the price of a loaf of bread retail would be from five cents to seven cents. However, in our free enterprise system surely the markup of the bakeries and retailers will largely determine what the price of that loaf will be in one's favourite store.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, may I take this opportunity to correct one statement of Senator Riley's so that it will not go unchallenged?

Senator Asselin: Are you asking a question?

Senator Buckwold: No, I am simply correcting a statement Senator Riley made when he was putting his question. He said that there had been a subsidy to the wheat farmers. I even wrote down that comment, because I was astounded by it. The fact is that the subsidy was to the consumer of bread, not to the wheat farmer. The wheat farmer had a floor ceiling of $3.25, which is now going up to $4. I don't want anyone to be under the misapprehension that the $100 million subsidy went to the farmers. It went to the consumers.

Senator Riley: I stand corrected, Senator Buckwold, and I apologize.

FUGITIVE OFFENDERS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Monday, November 27, the debate on the motion of Senator McIlraith for the second reading of Bill S-9, respecting fugitive offenders in Canada.

● (1440)

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I did not intend to participate in the debate on second reading of this bill, particularly when I saw that our friends opposite were beginning to quarrel, which gave me the impression that the further we get in the session the more we see that the government side is divided. And when the government side is divided, well, we know what happens.

In any event, I have been asked to say a few words on the bill now before us. Of course, there are not many things to be said as it is nearly a repetition of Bill S-8 that was introduced in the Senate last year. Indeed, Senator McIlraith pointed out that there is no significant departure from the old bill.

This afternoon I read the statement by the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Ron Basford, when he appeared before the committee on Bill S-8. He said that they had been forced—of course, he was right—to change a law that was as old as the Canadian Confederation. The old law is nearly 100 years old. He went on to say that, of course, several factors had made those changes to Bill C-8 necessary, particularly the ease with which modern society can move, and that we were living in an age of rapid communication. In addition, there are in many countries social movements, major political malaises, which result in a substantial increase in crime and allow criminals to move more easily from one country to another after they committed a crime.

So, honourable senators, the opposition is not coming all out against this bill, Bill S-9, because we understand its importance and the need for it.

Nevertheless, when you examine this bill closely, certain questions come to mind, and we would like to have clarification.

tion, more detailed explanations to understand certain terms used in the bill now before us.

The first clarification that I would like to get from the sponsor of the bill has to do with offences of a political character. Instead of giving the definition of what an offence of political character is—then, of course, it refers to political prisoners—it provides a definition, but by way of exclusion. It says:

“offence of a political character” does not include

(a) the murder, kidnapping or other assault on or restriction of—

Second, it does not include such and such a crime; third, it does not include also such and such a crime.

There is no definition of what a political prisoner is, what an offence of a political character is. They will tell you that a political prisoner is one who in his country is being pursued by the authority in power, the government, for an offence he has not committed but whom the government would pursue in any case to get rid of him as someone opposed to the authority in power. This might be it. However, there might also be a definition that was forgotten in the bill and which would be extremely important in judging individual cases as they occur.

When someone is charged with an offence, it is not easy to determine if he is guilty of a criminal or a political offence. I saw this myself when I was asked by a United Nations commission to go to Ruanda-Urundi in 1961, with a delegate from Brazil and another from Tunisia, before independence was granted to Ruanda-Urundi, as the United Nations had adopted a resolution asking a commission to go to that country to study the records of approximately 2,000 political prisoners of the Belgian administration of that time who had been imprisoned following a revolt or a popular revolution. The three commissioners had to study each record and hear the representations of counsel for the Crown and the defence. Moreover, we often had to visit the prisoners, who were designated as political prisoners, to determine whether they had used this revolt to commit criminal offences or to take revenge against a neighbour or someone else.

Honourable senators, I can guarantee that it was difficult for us, when we met the general delegate who represented the Belgian administrative authorities, to tell him: Well, in our view such-and-such a prisoner in such-and-such a jail has committed a political offence and not a criminal offence.

I therefore understand that it is not easy to define a political prisoner in this bill.

In my opinion, we had political prisoners ourselves in 1970 when Canada implemented the War Measures Act. Everyone will recall the facts. The government said that there was a risk of insurrection in Quebec and that it had to do something to stop it. It then sent the army into the province of Quebec to get the situation under control. Moreover, hundreds of persons were arrested in a single night and were held for a week or ten days without a hearing. To my mind, they were political prisoners. However, were the people who played an active role in the FLQ and who opposed the established system political prisoners? Nowadays, we hear about people like the Cossette-Trudels who want to come back voluntarily to Canada to be tried. Are these people—

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am authorized to inform the Senate that neither our posts abroad nor the department in Ottawa have yet been approached by the Cossette-Trudels, regardless of the press report of yesterday.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I thank the Leader of the Government for that information. However, this was not the purpose of my remarks. Nevertheless, the fact is that if the Department of External Affairs has not been approached yet, it might be only because they do not need a new passport to return to Canada, as I understand that they never gave up their Canadian citizenship. In any event, the Department of External Affairs will deal with those administrative aspects of the matter. Of course, some colleagues told me that those people could not come back to Canada as they had committed a kidnapping. Considering the political circumstances prevailing in 1970, are they not going to claim that they are political prisoners? I put that question to the house to demonstrate that this bill might have given a more accurate definition of political prisoner and political offences. This is the first remark I wished to make.

My second point concerns the discretionary power of the minister. This has already been discussed in committee and we come back to it in Bill S-9. Generally, except for very important matters, I have always been against the use of discretionary power by the minister when a court of justice has rendered a decision. We know that, pursuant to this legislation, those under a deportation order who have been seeking refuge in our country will have to appear before a judge, before a court. That court will have to establish evidence and the judge will decide if those people shall be sent back to their country to be tried there. However, from time to time the minister will be able to use his discretionary power as a cabinet member. But when a court of justice has rendered a decision, can we allow the minister to use his discretionary power and say that, in spite of the decision of the court, that person will not be deported to his country for such-and-such a reason?

Again I think that the minister will have to give up this discretionary power and leave to the courts the use of the power he has under this act.

The third point I wanted to mention is the one also raised by Senator McIlraith when he indicated the new elements contained in the bill. If Senator McIlraith wishes to keep track of my arguments I would refer him to page 268 of Hansard for November 27, 1978, when he said:

There is one substantial change made, and only one, between Bill S-8 of the last session and Bill S-9 of this session.

This has to do with the discretionary power of the minister of refusing to surrender a fugitive to any country which applies the death penalty.

Under Bill S-8, which was very precise in its wording, the minister could refuse to deport to another country a fugitive in Canada, if the death penalty was applicable in that country and if that person by the fact of being returned to his country would be exposed to such a punishment.

We are now going even further in the present bill because its sponsor tells us, and I quote:

The revised provision—and it is a completely changed clause—allows the minister discretion to refuse to surrender a fugitive “where it appears to him that the fugitive offender would be likely to suffer an excessively severe or inhumane punishment for the returnable offence in respect of which his return is requested.”

Honourable senators, you see what I meant when I said earlier that the discretionary power of the minister is often dangerous, especially when it is applied or used. In this case, in addition to refusing to surrender a fugitive to the country to which he belongs and where he has committed a crime, the minister could also refuse to extradite if the fugitive offender is likely to suffer an excessively severe or inhumane punishment. Yet no definition is given as to what is meant by excessively severe or inhumane punishment.

Once again I think that this bill is ambiguous. What is meant by excessively severe or inhumane punishment? Does it mean a long jail sentence? Does it mean a sentence to hard labour? Are we actually dealing with a sentence when a fugitive would be submitted to torture? We do not know. In my opinion, when the minister appears before the committee he will have to define what he means and submit a list to be included in this bill, which would mention the excessively severe inhumane punishments which would allow the minister to refuse to surrender a fugitive illegally staying in Canada.

These are essential points. There are other issues which leave me wondering. One of them has to do with the question of setting bail. It is provided in this bill that the offender will be allowed to apply for bail. Again it has been the tendency in Parliament these last years to try to shift the burden of the proof, which has been on the Crown to prove the accused guilty. Up until now, the Bail Act has provided that where the accused is requesting bail it is up to the Crown to show cause why it should be denied. Under the legislation before us, the accused, the person to be deported, must satisfy the court that bail should be granted. As I said, this is reversing the burden of proof. It is not basic to our criminal law, as it is in French law, that the accused be guilty until proven innocent. Here, he is innocent until proven guilty.

Now, honourable senators, I could of course raise other matters needing clarification or further details, but I think this could be done in committee. In the face of these ambiguities I have pointed to this afternoon, it is essential in my view that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, for further study.

Before concluding however, I would like to ask the mover—and if he cannot answer, the minister will do so in committee—why this legislation applies only to Commonwealth countries recognizing the Queen as head of state, not to the other Commonwealth countries that do not recognize her. I cannot see the rationale behind this. If we refer back to Bill C-60, which was put forward by the government during the last session, under that piece of legislation the government, in the views of a number of senators, including Senator Forsey—the government changed the role and responsibilities of the Queen in favour of the Governor General. Looking at the bill as it is written, the legislation would not apply here, for the reason that the Queen would no longer be recognized as Queen of Canada, as certain senators submit would be the case under Bill C-60, because that responsibility would have been transferred to the Governor in Council.

Those, honourable senators, are the comments I have at this stage on Bill S-9. I feel it should be referred to committee, but we are pleased to state at this point that we support the principle of the bill, and I submit the time has come for the government to shake some dust off this century old statute.

[English]

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator McIlraith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, in reply to the remarks of Senator Asselin I must say I thought that on second reading I dealt with the difficulty, as I saw it, in the definition of the term “political offender.” It is, of course, a matter of definition that varies from time to time; indeed, the term was unknown when the original bill was passed some 96 years ago.

● (1500)

I can see no relationship at all between the definition of “political offender,” as it is found in the bill before us, and those concerned in the FLQ crisis of 1970. In that case we are dealing with Canadians who are out of the country by their own choice. They were not charged with any criminal offence and are not now charged with any criminal offence. However, there was an indication given that they would be charged if they returned to Canada. Indeed, I know nothing of the current suggestion that they are considering returning to Canada, except what I read in newspaper articles.

I listened with attention to the statement of the Leader of the Government on that matter today. In any event, there is no attempt to return them by means of extradition proceedings at the present time. I should say I am unwilling to relate the circumstances of 1970 to this legislation.

Senator Asselin: You were the Solicitor General at that time.

Senator McIlraith: Yes. I made it clear in my introductory remarks that I hoped a Senate committee would look closely at the clause dealing with political offenders, because I think it requires careful examination.

The next point raised by the honourable senator concerned the discretion of the minister in respect of refusing to return an alleged offender to a foreign country in certain circumstances. I took the precaution of directing the attention of the house to that clause in my opening remarks on November 27. It will be seen that the discretion is wider than that in Bill S-8, which was before the Senate in the last session. The former bill gave a discretion simply to refuse to return a person sought to be extradited by a foreign country if the death penalty could be exacted for the offence. It was limited to that, but clause 18(1) now gives a wider discretion. It states:

The Minister may refuse to order the surrender of a fugitive offender where it appears to him that the fugitive offender would be likely to suffer an excessively severe or inhumane punishment for the returnable offence in respect of which his return is requested.

I am usually opposed to granting a minister discretion, but the granting of the discretion in this case arises because the Commonwealth has grown from a small number of countries to a large number of countries, and one of the difficulties arising out of this is that in some parts of the Commonwealth parliamentary democracies have changed to systems of government that are very foreign to us. This has carried with it some concepts of criminal law that are, indeed, not acceptable as far as any Canadian is concerned.

I am sure honourable senators have read recent articles about a person who was up for deportation. He told the immigration authorities that if he were returned to his own country he would be punished by being torn apart by camels pulling his limbs in four directions at the same time. I do not know whether that would have been the case, but that concept of punishment is one that is totally offensive to Canadians. Surely there must be a discretion to refuse to return a fugitive offender if he faces punishment as severe as that.

There are many countries in the world with different systems of government. For instance, there is one notorious head of state who executes people with sledge hammers. I am sure no Canadian would approve of that type of punishment. We must be realistic in our thinking, and recognize that this type of change has occurred over the years.

A question was raised with respect to those parts of the Commonwealth where the Queen is head of state. I am afraid honourable senators did not understand my remarks, probably because I did not make them sufficiently clear. I attempted to say that the present act is applicable to those parts of the Commonwealth where the Queen is recognized as head of state, and not to those countries where she is not. The proposed new legislation is applicable to all parts of the Commonwealth. That was the distinction I was drawing, and not a distinction between this bill and Bill S-8 of the last session.

On the subject of bail, the discretion now given a judge in Canada is to hold an accused person in jail until there is a bail hearing. The accused can then demonstrate why he should have bail. I was not pointing out a change as between Bill S-8 and Bill S-9, but rather the difference between this law and the criminal law in Canada as applied to Canadians who usually have established residences, and so on. That is the distinction I was trying to draw to the attention of the Senate. The rule applicable in ordinary cases under the criminal law is not being made applicable in extradition cases.

I hope honourable senators will find my remarks helpful in understanding the bill, and I look forward to a complete examination of it in committee.

THE LATE HON. JOHN JAMES GREENE, P.C.

ADDRESS PREPARED FOR THRONE SPEECH DEBATE PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, on Thursday, October 19 last, the late Senator John James Greene rose on a question of privilege to request that his name be correctly spelled in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

He had made arrangements with the whip to participate in the debate on the Speech from the Throne on Tuesday, October 24. He had prepared a typical Greene speech for the occasion. He died on Monday, October 23, and was buried on Thursday, October 26.

In his lifetime he delivered many speeches in Parliament. There is one undelivered speech to which I should like to refer. Senator Greene's family and many senators have asked that the speech he prepared for delivery on Tuesday, October 24 be appended to the Debates of the Senate of this day, and I so request.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is so ordered.

(For text of speech, see appendix, p. 311.)

THE HONOURABLE TED STEVENS

EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY TO UNITED STATES SENATOR

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators will have learned of the tragic accident which befell the United States senator from Alaska, Ted Stevens, and Mrs. Stevens last evening. Ted Stevens has been a merciless and tenacious adversary of a number of our policies, particularly in the fields of energy and environment, in recent years. Nonetheless, he has also been an honourable and dear friend of Canada and of Canadians.

Mrs. Stevens died in the accident. Senator Stevens' condition, according to my last information, is stable, and he is possibly recovering.

Senator Stevens has been a continuing and active member of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group. My wife and I had the pleasure of spending an hour or two with the Stevens last Thursday evening in Lisbon, where we were all attending the North Atlantic Assembly. On Friday morning they were leaving somewhat earlier than we were, and Ted and Ann and my wife and I were talking about when our next get-together would be, and planning to telephone each other soon to make plans. The news, heard and seen last night, was an utter shock.

To their children, Susan, Beth, Roger, Ted Junior, and Ben I would like to offer an expression of our deep grief and sympathy on the demise of Ann Stevens. To Ted may we extend the assurance of our prayers for his recovery and continued contribution to the essential affairs of his state and his country, both being more immediate neighbours to us than other areas, and his continued sympathetic co-operation in North American public service.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, may I add a word to Senator Lafond's remarks.

Those of us who have served on the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group knew Senator Stevens and his wife, Ann, very well. Senator Stevens is probably one of the most articulate and knowledgeable members of the American side of that group, and his contribution to our deliberations has been without parallel. To all of us who have known him, this news comes as a terrible shock, particularly because of our knowledge of the loss he will feel and the suffering he will go through as a result of the death of his wife.

I would like to express, on behalf of the Canadian side of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, our deepest sympathy to Senator Stevens, and our wish for his rapid physical recovery and for his recovery from the personal shock of the tragic loss of his wife.

INCOME TAX ACT FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Barrow: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, Bill C-10 contains one of the most significant social policy reforms of the past decade in this country. The changes it introduces represent a significant reform of the child benefit system. The main feature of the reform is, of course, the introduction into the federal tax system of a refundable tax credit. This will make our social security system more selective. As well, benefits will be reduced for those who are better off financially, and increased for lower and middle income families who are most hurt by inflation.

There is a need for the government to adjust the income that a family has at its disposal because, in our free market system, wage rates are set without regard to the family responsibilities of the worker. Of course, this is the only reasonable way in which the system can operate. However, it does mean that wage earners with large families may find that they have insufficient income to provide for the needs of their children. In such cases, then, there is a natural and necessary role for government.

This was recognized over 30 years ago by the Marsh Report on Social Security for Canada which recommended the introduction of family allowances. Indeed, the then Prime Minister, the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, argued that it was society's overall responsibility to assist in the costs of child rearing. He further argued that, since all children were an asset to the nation, family allowances should be universal.

Child benefits have a long history in Canada. Successive Canadian Parliaments have improved and expanded these benefits. In 1918, only one year after it was introduced, the income tax system was amended to introduce child tax exemptions. These exemptions have been a major element in our tax system since then. I might note, however, that for a brief period during World War II, they were replaced by non-refundable child tax credits. Mr. Mackenzie King introduced family allowances in 1945 to assist Canadian families with the costs of raising children. They have been increased periodically since that time, and in 1974 were tripled in value to $20 per child and were indexed to the cost of living. The most recent addition to the federal child benefits system is the $50 per child adjustment to the federal tax reduction which was introduced in 1976.

The system which has evolved in Canada, then, combines both tax adjustments and direct transfers to families with children. Family allowances provide benefits of $308 per child per annum to mothers. These benefits are fully indexed and are taxable. In 1978, they will provide some $1.8 billion of after-tax benefits to families with children. The tax system also provides fully indexed child exemptions. These are $460 per child for dependent children under 16 and $840 per child for dependent children 16 and over. The cost of these exemptions in terms of federal taxes foregone is estimated at about $650 million for 1978. Finally, many Canadian families benefit from the $50 per child tax credit. This provides about $260 million of assistance. Together, these components of the federal child benefits system distribute about $2.7 billion to Canadian families with children.

Thus, the child benefits system provides assistance to all the approximately 7.2 million Canadian children. The two major elements of this system, family allowances and child tax exemptions, are fully indexed to the cost of living. This ensures that the assistance they provide is protected against the rising cost of living. Finally, the family allowances are paid to the mother to ensure that the money is spent in the best interests of the child.

Nevertheless, deficiencies remain. The system is not as equitable as it could be. Federal child benefits are less for a poor family than for a rich one. For example, an Ontario family with two children and $5,000 of annual income receives benefits only from family allowances. Thus, it receives $616 this year from the federal government. Contrast this with the benefits received by a two-child family which has $50,000 of annual income. They receive both the taxable family allowance and the child tax exemption. Together these provide the family with $774 of assistance. What's more, if the children were of age 16 and 17, this family would actually get $1,168 because of the higher tax exemption for older children. However, a low income family with two children of age 16 and 17 would still get only $616.

Therefore, despite the major commitment of government resources amounting to $2.7 billion, the child benefits system is not as effective as it could be in meeting the needs of children. There are still nearly 600,000 families with over one million children living in poverty. Further, there is considerable evidence that such children are severely undernourished and suffer from a much higher incidence of sickness than more fortunate children. Moreover, severe retardation in their physical development has also been identified. Naturally, with these physical disadvantages the school performance of these children also suffers. And, these disadvantages mean that the children grow up without the training and skills to get good jobs. They are relegated to low-paying, unsatisfying work. As a result, they in turn are unable to give their children a good start in life, and so the vicious circle of poverty continues.

Beyond this direct human cost to the poor themselves, there are also significant economic costs to society. It means greater demands on a whole range of government services such as social services and health care. Unfortunately, because of the despair and alienation it breeds, poverty also leads to more crime and violence in our society. Furthermore, failing to give all children the best possible start in life is a waste of valuable human resources. Because they are less well educated, they are not able to reach their full potential as productive members of society. The disadvantages faced by many children in need eventually result in lower economic growth. Everyone loses from poverty, and so everyone gains when poverty is reduced.

In spite of our achievements in this area there is still a need for more to be done. Even with the level of assistance we are now providing, many families are still experiencing difficulties in meeting the needs of their children. Families with children are particularly vulnerable to the rising cost of living. It is appropriate, then, that something be done at this time the better to meet the needs of these families. The system now in place needs to be altered so that the level of benefits more accurately reflects the needs of children. This means that we have to change the current system so that families who need it get more assistance than those who do not. This, I think, is an eminently sensible goal.

However, we also face the reality that we are going through a difficult economic period. The government is seeking ways to cut overall government spending. Therefore, we do not have access to new resources with which to improve the current system. Instead, we must re-arrange the existing system so that it will be fairer and will better meet the needs of children. That is, we must do a better job with the resources already at our disposal.

We have had the advantage of reading the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance on second reading of the bill in the House of Commons, and I would not want to repeat what he has said. I would prefer to develop certain discussion points which are likely to interest you. I will talk, indeed, about the main features of the reform, and I would like to emphasize the mechanics and the financial implications of each of those measures.

Bill C-10 constitutes a reform in the federal child benefits system. The main elements of that reform are:

1. Elimination of the differential in the basic deduction for children aged 16 and 17.
2. Elimination of the $50 child tax credit.
3. Reduction in the monthly family allowance to $20 per month.
4. Introduction of a refundable tax credit of $200 per child.

The elimination of the differential in the amount of exemption for children of ages 16 and 17 is, in fact, a reduction in the tax exemption for those children. As you know, the Income Tax Act provides for personal exemptions in respect of dependent children. There was a difference in the amount of exemption based upon the age of the children. For children under the age of 16, the exemption was $300 indexed, and for those of 16 years of age and over, the exemption was $500 also indexed. For 1978, these amounts correspond to $460 and $840.

It is important to point out that this distinction dates from the days when family allowances were paid only for children under the age of 16. Now that family allowances are available to children up to the age of 18, the government proposes to rationalize the exemption system starting in 1979. The amount of exemption will be uniform for all children under the age of 18. As announced, the change will be phased in so that no taxpayer will lose the benefit of the higher deduction for children for whom the deduction is now claimed. This change will affect 250,000 families in the first full year of application of the new system and will save $25 million for the federal government.

Another element of the changes is the elimination of the $50 child tax credit for 1979 and subsequent taxation years. While it was a step in the right direction because it was limited to taxpayers with an income below $26,000, the main disadvantage of this non-refundable tax credit was that it provided no assistance to those who did not pay federal income tax. This change will affect 2.7 million taxpayers and will save $260 million for the federal government for the year 1979-80.

I now come to the most significant component of these changes—the introduction of the child tax credit.

The key characteristic of this credit is the fact that it is refundable; that is, with the introduction of this credit, the federal tax system will, for the first time, be able to deliver benefits to rich and poor alike. Because it is refundable, it will be received even by those who do not have taxes to pay. Some 2.5 million, or two-thirds, of all Canadian families with children will receive some benefits under the new credit. In addition, the use of the tax system for this new benefit means Canadians will face a delivery mechanism that is as streamlined as possible with a minimum of red tape. And, the additional administrative costs involved are small as compared with setting up a completely new federal agency to administer the program.

The credit commences for the 1978 taxation year and will be claimed when 1978 tax returns are filed. For 1978, the credit is $200 per eligible child of the individual. The full benefit of the credit will be available up to a family income of $18,000. The credit will be reduced by five per cent of family income above $18,000. A family with two children and an income below $18,000 will receive $400. At an income of $20,000 they will receive $300. At an income of $26,000 a family with two children would receive no tax credit.

The amounts of $200 and $18,000 used in relation to the credit have been chosen for financial reasons and because they permitted an appropriate redistribution of the benefits. The estimated cost of the credit is $810 million per year. I should also point out that the credit will be fully indexed so that as the Minister of Finance announced in his recent budget, the credit will be $218 per child and will be payable in full up to $19,620 for the 1979 taxation year.

The credit will be paid on behalf of all children in respect of whom family allowances are payable at the end of the taxation year. Thus, a child born in the year will be eligible for full credit but a child who turns 18 in the year will not be eligible. The higher amount of exemptions will, however, be allowed for dependent children who are 18 or over.

A feature of this child tax credit is that it will be paid to mothers. This is consistent with the payment of family allowance cheques to mothers. Paying these child-related benefits to mothers ensures that the money is spent in the best interests of the children. In total, some 1.5 million Canadian mothers will, for the first time, have some contact with the income tax system in the form of applying for and receiving the new credit. On balance, these initiatives will provide in the neighbourhood of $120 million in additional money for the family budgets of Canadian mothers.

In spite of these very significant improvements, some people have expressed the concern that the credit discriminates on the basis of marital status to the disadvantage of women. I should like to emphasize that this opinion is not correct. Eligibility for the credit has nothing to do with marital status. Anyone who has the care and custody of a child can receive the credit, be he or she single, divorced, widowed, married, separated or deserted. The credit is based on the income of the family unit whether there is one parent or two. What is of concern is the amount of money available in the family budget to take care of the children. This program is designed to give more assistance to those families with children who need it. There is no question that both parents' incomes are treated exactly the same in calculating the credit. The government wants to give additional assistance to those families who need it, and to do that we must take into account the total family budget no matter which parent contributes to it.

To get the credit, the beneficiary of family allowances must file a simple one-page application form with his or her tax return. Forms for claiming credit benefits will be mailed with the family allowance cheque in January, 1979. The form will require information on the number of children and the net income of both spouses.

The amount of the credit is related to the family's income. Family income is defined as the net income of both spouses while married if they resided together at the end of the year. In the case of a change in the marital status during the year, such as a divorce, a separation or a death, the income earned by the individual's spouse before such a change will not be included in the computation of the family income for the year.

Net income is the closest definition of income in the income tax system to take-home pay. Thus it allows deductions for employment expenses, social security contributions, Canada Pension Plan, Quebec Pension Plan and Unemployment Insurance; pension plan contributions such as registered pension plans, and registered retirement savings plans; registered home ownership plan contributions; tuition fees; union dues; child care expenses, and certain other deductions. Since it is computed on the tax returns of those who are already filers, this definition also has the advantage of being simple for both claimants and administrators.

Credit benefits will serve first to offset any amount of tax due from the individual claiming the credit. For 1978, any amount refundable will be paid in full to the claimant at the time of processing tax returns. In subsequent years, it is possible that the credit will be paid in instalments during the year. However, some technical difficulties will have to be solved before the government can make a final decision on this.

As the final element of these changes, family allowances will be reduced to $20 per child per month. Unfortunately, some reduction in family allowances became essential in order to provide more to those who needed it without requiring more government resources. Nevertheless, it will remain the largest single federal child-related program and continue as the foundation of the overall federal system of child benefits. Furthermore, it will remain fully indexed. Moreover, the special allowances that are paid in respect of children who are in the care of provinces or in foster homes will be unaffected by this reduction in family allowances.

The system that results combines the child tax credit, the reduced family allowances and the tax changes to achieve the best of both the universal and the selective approaches. Because it retains a universal, indexed family allowance program, it recognizes the additional responsibilities and costs of child rearing faced by all families with children. At the same time, the new child tax credit concentrates benefits on those who need it. The new system will operate with a minimum of bureaucracy and governmental interference in the lives of Canadians. It will do this while recognizing the central role of the mother in the care and rearing of the children.

These changes will result in a child system which is significantly fairer than the present one. That will mean that low income families will now receive greater federal benefits than will high income families. If we return to the example of a two-child family living in Ontario, to which I referred earlier, this improvement will become abundantly clear. In the new system, the two-child family with $5,000 of annual income will, in 1979, receive a total of $880 from the child benefits system. This is an increase of $264 over what it received this year. The same family, but with $50,000, of annual income will receive $750; that is, $24 a year less than they now receive. Thus, low income families will receive substantially more, while the loss of benefits to high income families will be minor.

In addition to making the system fairer, the changes being proposed will allow the government to do a more effective job in providing assistance to those who need it. This can be seen by looking at the overall distributional impact of the changes. The credit will deliver some $270 million to families with incomes below the Statistics Canada low income cut-offs. However, taking into account the reduction in family allowances and the other tax changes, an additional $108 million will go to families with incomes below the low income cut-offs. I should note that these cut-offs are relatively low—$9,688 for a family of four in 1978—so that they tend to understate the effectiveness of these initiatives. For this reason, they omit many families who, by other measures, would be considered poor or working poor.

However, just as statistics do not provide the true picture of the disadvantages faced by many children in Canada, so the statistics also underestimate the benefits which we can expect from these initiatives. They will help to improve almost all aspects of the lives of low and middle income families with children. By improving the financial conditions in which children are raised, we can expect that they will benefit through better nutrition, better housing and a general improvement in their overall circumstances. This initiative will not eradicate the handicaps many children face, but it will significantly improve their chances for a healthy and productive life.

I would like to add a few words on the confidentiality issue. As you know, clause 9 of the bill would allow Revenue Canada to provide information on the income of one spouse to the other spouse in the course of assessing their tax returns and determining the credit payable. I should also note that this can only be done after each spouse has signed the application form.

This requirement, honourable senators, is really no different from the provisions currently in place in respect of other government programs. To qualify for housing assistance under CMHC programs, families are required to report their joint incomes. Similarly, the calculations of guaranteed income supplements and Canada Assistance Plan requires exchange of information between spouses.

Further, I should stress—and this is very important—that no child tax credit can be claimed unless both spouses complete and sign the application form. Should one spouse refuse to do so, Revenue Canada cannot divulge any information whatsoever to the other spouse. This approach respects the will of the taxpayers, and in no way interferes with the confidentiality of tax returns. Thus, the power conferred upon Revenue Canada through clause 9 can in no way be construed as a breach of the principle of confidentiality of tax returns, but merely allows the transfer of information necessary to complete the tax credit application after the consent of both spouses has been granted.

The elements of this bill imply no net increase in social policy expenditures. They represent a realignment of social policies in the direction of providing more money where it is needed most. This money will go to those Canadians most likely to provide a stimulus to the economy by spending it on the necessities of life. They will help ensure that those hurt most by inflation and those least able to cope with economic problems receive the assistance they need.

Thus, the child benefits system will now direct a greater proportion of benefits to low and middle income families. Therefore, it will be more effective in meeting the needs of those families. And, let me emphasize, this will be achieved without requiring any extra resources. The resulting system, then, retains the best features of the current system while concentrating more resources on those who need it most.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I find it very difficult to understand what is going on. I was obligated with regard to Bill S-6, which was referred to a committee scheduled to meet at 8.30 tonight. It is now a quarter to nine. Somebody comes along, because of a threat from the other place, to introduce this bill, asking leave to move second reading tonight, and I am now fifteen minutes late in fulfilling my responsibility to the Senate in room 356-S on Bill S-6, the Shipping Conferences Exemption Bill, 1979.

I am wondering when we are going to be able to fulfil our responsibility to deal with matters on behalf of the people of Canada. Now I can only ask, with embarrassment, that the debate on this bill be adjourned until tomorrow because of my responsibility to attend the meeting of the committee that is considering Bill S-6. I say that it is absolutely and utterly ridiculous that we should be under the gun from the other place to deal with this bill today.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators—

Senator Asselin: Let him finish.

Senator Marshall: Why should I have to wait fifteen minutes and then be delayed another fifteen minutes before I can fulfil my responsibility to the committee, which I have to fulfil on behalf of my leader and my party, and put forward the arguments we want to advance?

Senator Benidickson: Where is Bill S-6 on the order paper?

Senator Marshall: I don't care where it is on the order paper. If you look at the notice of meetings of committees you will see that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications is meeting in room 356-S at 8.30 p.m., and I should have been there fifteen minutes ago. When are we going to smarten up around here?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we are under no urgent pressure from the other place to rush this legislation with inappropriate haste. We do have an offer by the minister, the Honourable Monique Bégin, to testify before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which began a pre-study of this bill on November 22. The minister has offered to appear before the committee tonight at approximately nine o'clock. There is no suggestion that honourable senators need rush this bill through in great haste. Unfortunately, the honourable senator has not had the opportunity to be apprised of an understanding that we had achieved earlier with respect to this matter.

Senator Marshall: I did know that this was going to happen. I listened to Senator Barrow, who made a very good case for the bill, because it is my responsibility to reply. I am looking at the clock, and I see that the committee meeting at which I have the responsibility to speak for my party has been going on for fifteen minutes. Can you explain that to me?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, one of our difficulties is in the record amount of work being done by the Senate at present. Today, for example, there are nine meetings of Senate committees. As a result, there is the possibility of senators being called upon to attend a number of meetings of great importance. As we know, there are occasions when proposed legislation is sufficiently important that committee meetings have to be held while the Senate is sitting. It is our proposal tonight to have an adjournment to allow the minister to appear before the committee at around nine o'clock. This is the only time she can come this week, and I know most senators wish to hear from the minister. This will really add to the total consideration of the Senate of this important measure.

Senator Marshall: I agree with the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I hope we will not have the same situation as we had in the case of the old age security bill, when it seems somebody was lurking outside the doors ready to give the wrong impression to the people of Canada that we were holding up a bill intended to benefit our senior citizens, except that in this case they will try to make the Canadian people believe that we are holding up a bill intended to benefit the children of our country.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

MEETING OF COMMITTEE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: I am not too sure about that. My understanding was that the committee would sit only when the Senate rises.

Senator Langlois: That is at 9 o'clock.

Senator Flynn: Yes, I know.

This motion is not necessary.

Senator Langlois: But just in case—

Senator Flynn: The motion is not necessary. The agreement was that because there is another committee sitting, this committee would sit only when the Senate rises. Let the minister wait a few minutes.

Senator Perrault: That is satisfactory.

NEWFOUNDLAND

ANNUAL SEAL HUNT—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. It concerns a Canadian Press story that a United States based animal welfare group is urging Americans to boycott travel to Canada until the annual Newfoundland seal hunt is stopped. Would the leader ascertain what the government is going to do to counteract the false, mischievous, anti-Canadian advertising, and the dissemination of junk mail throughout Canada, by irresponsible crackpots who have nothing better to do? It is a ridiculous and stupid waste of money, and it does nothing but cause trouble.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, not having seen the article in question, may I request that a copy be provided for the use of the office of the Leader of the Government in the Senate? That information will then be brought to the attention of the appropriate minister for a response.

Senator Marshall: I hope that the minister will treat this matter as urgent, because this stupid and ridiculous junk mail is going out to Canadians everywhere, and it completely falsifies the situation with regard to Newfoundland sealers, who are trying to get an income from the seal hunt.

FORESTRY SERVICE

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF WINNIPEG OFFICE—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate could provide me with some information respecting the report that the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment intends to close the Winnipeg office of the Canadian Forestry Service. My question has to do with the system of priorities that the department is working on that led it to the conclusion that the closing of this office, which I think has considerable scientific importance, should be chosen as a vehicle for effecting some of the economies the department is undoubtedly trying to secure. I am interested in knowing on what scale of values they are operating that leads them to believe this is an effective step to take.

Could the leader also tell us how much money is involved, how many staff are involved, and what the disposition of the scientific staff now in Winnipeg will be when this closure takes effect?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

RETURN OF COSSETTE-TRUDELS TO CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. We heard today that the Cossette-Trudels would be brought back by provincial or federal police officials and that they would soon return to Canada. The Leader of the Government told us last week that the Secretary of State for External Affairs had declared that no arrangement was made by External Affairs concerning the return of the Cossette-Trudels to Canada. First, I wish to know if, since the announcement made last week by the Leader of the Government concerning the possible return of the Cossette-Trudels, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has made arrangements with that couple.

Also, it might be interesting for the Senate to know what arrangements had been made between the Government of Canada and the Cossette-Trudels when Mr. Cross was released and those people left the country? There has been an agreement between the federal government and the Cossette-Trudels and I wish to know if the Senate could be informed of that agreement. Furthermore, could the Leader of the Government table those agreements?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, most of that question must be taken as notice, but I can advise that as of November 30, neither our posts abroad nor the department in Ottawa had been approached by the Cossette-Trudels; but on that date the Canadian embassy in Paris had been authorized to issue them emergency passports for return to Canada at the moment. That is all the information available at this time.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. I repeat: Could the Leader of the Government tell us if this house might be informed about the agreements or arrangements made between the federal government and the Cossette-Trudels when they left the country after releasing Mr. Cross? Obviously arrangements had been made before they left the country. Are there such arrangements and, if so, could they be tabled by the Leader of the Government?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only say in response that the question will be referred to the appropriate minister.

POST OFFICE

INCREASE IN POSTAL RATES—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government when I may expect to have some answer to the question I asked nearly two weeks ago, on November 22, with respect to the government's intentions in the matter of raising the postal rates in April, and with respect to whether the government intended to proceed in what appears not only to me but to the Statutory Instruments Committee and, indeed, to both houses, to be the proper manner, namely, by an amendment to the Post Office Act, or whether it proposes to repeat what it has done on two previous occasions and proceed in what the two houses have declared to be an improper manner, by regulation under the Financial Administration Act. I would be very glad if the honourable leader could give us some idea of when we may expect some kind of answer to this question.

● (2050)

Senator Perrault: All I can say is that as yet no reply has been received. The matter will be pursued further as quickly as possible.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SALE OF LABRADOR LINERBOARD MILL LTD.—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government why, after a week or so, an answer has not been forthcoming to a question I asked on November 28.

The question dealt with the sale of Labrador Linerboard Mill Ltd. The importance of the question is in the fact that the closure of this mill denied some 2,000 jobs to Canadians. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion made a commitment with regard to the sale of the mill that it would ensure the changeover and reactivation of the mill which would reactivate some 2,000 jobs. When might I expect an answer to that question?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the answers to some of these questions require a great deal of research and a considerable amount of staff time. Basically, both houses are served by the same researchers. I can only suggest that that might be one of the reasons why the requested information has not yet been received.

ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

CANADA-NEWFOUNDLAND FIELD EXPLORATION PROGRAM— QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 5—By Senator Marshall:

Under the Canada-Newfoundland Field Exploration Program and in particular its reference to the fact that thirty survey parties will be hired for geological mapping and geochemical surveys, how will the survey parties be selected and how and where will the information be advertised in the province of Newfoundland?

Reply by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources:

Under the Canada-Newfoundland Subsidiary Agreement on Mineral Development a five year (January 1, 1977 to December 31, 1981) program of geological mapping, geochemical surveys and related work is being conducted on Insular Newfoundland and Labrador. The work is being implemented by the Newfoundland Department of Mines and Energy and managed by a federal-provincial management committee having representatives from the provincial government and from the federal departments of Regional Economic Expansion and Energy, Mines and Resources.

Normally, 22 to 25 field parties are supported each year, involving about 100 persons, 50 to 70 of which are seasonal employees and are mainly university students. Hiring of temporary and seasonal staff and the letting of contracts for work under the Agreement, for example to consultants or to university staff, is done through the normal procedures established by the Province of Newfoundland, but is subject to the approval of the Management Committee for the Agreement. Preference for employment is given to Newfoundlanders.

Advertising for temporary staff and contract work is done primarily through Newfoundland newspapers and through university placement services, but in cases of special requirements positions may be advertised in national newspapers or in trade publications such as the Northern Miner.

FISHERIES

HUMBER-ST. GEORGE'S-ST. BARBE, NEWFOUNDLAND—INSHORE FISHERY—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

With reference to Fisheries and Environment Canada's Bulletin 78-2E, entitled "Fishermen's Information," on the subject of New Handling and Transport System for Newfoundland Inshore Fishery, in which fishing communities in the District of Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe have such systems been installed, and in which communities will they be provided in the future?

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment:

In the District of Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, a fish handling system has been completed at Stephenville. Hoists and hoppers have been installed at the following communities: Three Rock Cove, Blue Beach, Fox Island River, Littleport, Cox's Cove, Trout River, Rocky Harbour, St. Pauls, Cow Head, Parson's Pond, Caster's River South, Bartlett's Harbour, New Ferrole, Brig Bay, Blue Cove, Flowers Point, Sandy Cove, Green Island Cove, Cook's Harbour. At Black Duck Cove, Anchor Point and Savage Cove, blocks have been poured for the installation of the hoists. The system will be completed at all sites in 1979 and 1980.

Systems are proposed at this time for the following communities: Lourdes, Benoit's Cove, Port Saunders and Reef's Harbour.

NEWFOUNDLAND—INSHORE SQUID FISHERY—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 8—By Senator Marshall:

With reference to Fisheries and Environment Canada News Release FMS-HQ-NR-24 dated 29 June 1978, entitled "Charters Authorized for Developing Squid Fishery," what are the details of the catch executed by Newfoundland fishermen with respect to the 45,000 metric tons allocated for the province of Newfoundland?

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment:

In 1978 the Canadian quota for the Atlantic Coast inshore squid fishery was set at 40,000 m.t. Traditionally the bulk of the inshore squid catch has been taken by Newfoundland fishermen. Up to October 31, 1978, the inshore squid catches by Newfoundland fishermen were approximately 27,300 m.t.

In addition, some 8,400 m.t. of the offshore quota was approved for charter arrangements between foreign companies and Newfoundland firms. Up to October 31, 1978, the offshore catches under these arrangements were approximately 6,742 m.t.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill S-7, intituled: "An Act to implement conventions between Canada and the Republic of Korea and Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and an agreement between Canada and Jamaica for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax".—(Honourable Senator Thompson)

Senator Thompson: I move, seconded by the honourable Senator Laird, that this bill be now read a third time.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

STATUTE LAW (METRIC CONVERSION) AMENDMENT BILL, 1978

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved the second reading of Bill S-10, to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to move the second reading of Bill S-10. However, as I recognize that there are other commitments, I will be brief in my comments, and will not go through all the details of the bill. I do have fact sheets which give the details in addition to what is in the bill itself. Therefore, my remarks can be brief.

I hasten to add that the bill is not here under pressure from the other place, as was said about the previous bill. This bill, in fact, is a Senate bill.

Honourable senators will recall that when the metric plan was first introduced it was intended to have four major pieces of legislation which would bring other acts of Parliament into the metric system. The first bill, which was passed some time ago, received royal assent in 1977. The second bill was introduced in the other place but, because the session ended prior to its passage, it ceased to exist. The bill now before us combines the second and third bills, and contains amendments to ten existing acts. Very simply, the bill converts to metric measurement the various items in those ten acts.

I shall not deal with each act individually, but I do propose to highlight some of them. The Petroleum Administration Act is amended by this bill. In this case there is to be a change soon. Beginning on January 1, 1979, gasoline pumps across Canada will be converted to sell gasoline by the litre. This is one that is of immediate concern to us.

Senator Flynn: That will hide the increase in the price.

Senator Molgat: I do not know whether that will be the effect, but it is certainly not the intention.

Some of the acts recognize facts that presently exist. Under the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act, in fact, the St. Lawrence Seaway is operating on both the American and Canadian side in metric units.

For the details of the bill I would refer you to the fact sheet, but will be more than happy to supply any details which you might wish. I think the facts are straightforward. I should like to give, however, a brief report on the progress of metric conversion.

Insofar as Canada is concerned, we are roughly on schedule. It was originally planned to have four phases. The first phase was substantially completed by the end of 1975. The second phase, the planning phase, is now 86 per cent completed. The third phase, the scheduling, where the sector plans and timetables are reviewed and concurred in by all interested parties, is now 80 per cent complete. The implementation phase, the fourth and final phase, is approximately 38 per cent complete. This has been accomplished by over 2,000 volunteers, representing every sector of the economy, on 102 sector committees.

In the period from now to December 1981, there are two key events in metric conversion. When those are completed, the conversion, insofar as the general public is concerned, will have been completed.

The first one, to which I have already referred, is the change in January 1979, at which time companies selling gasoline, automotive petroleum products and heating oil by the gallon will begin selling those commodities by the litre. The second key event will see retail scales converted to grams and kilograms. This will begin in July 1979, with a pilot program in three centres, Kamloops, Peterborough, and Sherbrooke, and will be completed by the end of 1981.

I should like to point out that there has also been substantial progress insofar as public acceptance of the change to the metric system is concerned. While there was some public resistance in the earlier stages, a public opinion poll of July 1978, indicates that 53 per cent of Canadians agree with the metric conversion with 29 per cent disagreeing. This is an almost complete reversal of the 1974 figures.

The United States Weather Office proposal to convert to the Celsius scale in June 1979, was checked with executives of the United States media, and some 86 per cent responded in favour. I have to admit, on the other hand, that the General Accounting Office in the United States—and this has received some public notice—have indicated that they are opposed to the proposal.

In briefly covering what has happened in the other areas of the world, I should like to deal first with our major trading partner, the United States. Progress there has been consistent as well. The United States Metric Board was established in 1975 by an act of Congress, and has been in actual operation with people in place since April 1978.

On the private sector side, the American National Metric Council has been in operation since 1973, and has proceeded in much the same manner as we have—that is, it has taken a sector approach.

In the private sector a great deal more has, in fact, happened in the United States than most people recognize. At the moment, the major companies such as General Motors, Ford, Chrysler—in fact, all of the automotive field—and others such as IBM, all the major soft drink companies, American Can, and so on, are very far along on the metric conversion process. I understand that 80 per cent of General Motors components for 1979 models will be on the metric scale. So the Americans are moving along much faster than is recognized by many Canadians, I believe.

Progress in the European Economic Community, because many of its member countries were already on the metric scale, has been much faster. Basically they have been operating exclusively in metric units since April of this year. They have legislation now which makes it effective, and provides fines for those who do not comply. As honourable senators are aware, after the United States the European Economic Community is our next major trading partner.

So far as the main Commonwealth countries are concerned, the same thing can be said. There has been substantial progress. A good number of private corporations in Britain are now using the metric system. Internally, insofar as general goods, hardware and foods are concerned, the plan is that they will be converted to the metric system at the retail level by the end of 1981.

As to other Commonwealth countries, Australia is at present well ahead of Canada. It is roughly 75 per cent complete in metric conversion. New Zealand is in the process of disbanding its Metric Conversion Board because it has actually completed its work, and everything is on the metric system. Japan, our other major trading partner, completed its metric conversion in the early 1960s.

It will be recalled that the Senate itself, through the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, heard the chairman and executive director of the Metric Commission in May 1977 on the effects on Canadian trade. I think they were satisfied that the conversion was proceeding well, and that the advantages were substantial for Canada.

So, honourable senators, this is merely the second bill, or, rather, a combination of the second and third bills. There will be one further bill after this to permit other federal statutes to fit in with the metric system. This bill is in line with the decisions made when the metric timetable was first introduced, and I commend it to you in the hope that you will approve the principle behind it.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 301)

THE LATE HON. JOHN JAMES GREENE, P.C.

ADDRESS PREPARED FOR THRONE SPEECH DEBATE

Honourable senators, it is my privilege to speak in support of the motion of the Honourable Senator Rizzuto, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bird, for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

First, I commend Honourable Senators Rizzuto and Bird on their magnificent contributions to this debate. It has often been my contention that the worth of this house shall be determined not so much by the prescribed place of the second chamber in our Constitution as by the quality of our contribution to the national debate and the legislation-making process. I am loath to admit that my sanguine views on this premise have been somewhat diminished by experience, in that it is scarcely possible for the public to judge the value of our contribution when the essential link between Parliament and the people, the fourth estate, takes virtually no interest in our proceedings, whether they be in committee—where the work of the members of this chamber need take no second place to the work of any other chamber of review and revision—whether it be in the Canadian Parliament or in any other land which enjoys the blessings of parliamentary democracy. I was, as usual, disappointed when I found that the magnificent contributions of the mover and the seconder received but little if any comment or criticism in the media. However, I received some encouragement from the thought expressed by a young member of the other place who stated:

We did not come here to engage in Pitt-Sheridan-Fox parliamentary debate which may be of great historical moment but is of no current value.

I am of the firm conviction that parliamentary debate on the great issues affecting our people is the very essence of the difference between the philosophy of those who espouse the alleged efficiency of totalitarianism under any guise from socialism to national socialism, and the faith of those who believe that the preservation of individual freedom is the essential function of the state. It may well be that it is not merely the rewriting of a constitution which is our prime requisite but a complete oversight of the whole realm of the performance and function of government in a free and pluralistic society. In some sense the entire premise of representative government in the age of instant communications has changed.

It is surely obvious that in today's circumstances the people are not prepared to convey the decision-making power over their lives and affairs to "their representatives in Parliament" for a period of four years or more. They demand a more immediate and direct participation in the day-to-day decisions affecting the course of their lives. I am certain that Edmund Burke's great speech to the electors of Bristol would scarcely win one vote approval before the bar of current Canadian public opinion. It may thus well be that in taking this complete look at our body politic, the issue of the need for a bicameral Parliament should be reviewed.

Do we need a two-chamber Parliament, and, if so, what should be the respective roles of the two Houses of Parliament? This whole question goes far beyond the mere question of rewriting the Constitution. It goes to the very root of the nature of the institutions that will comprise that Constitution. Should the elective chamber of a bicameral Parliament be more actively involved in the affairs of government itself rather than being a forum of debate, discussion, and the ex post facto review of government decisions and accounts? In such event, would the second chamber then be the main forum of the debate, review and revision, and, if this be a valid premise, how should such a second chamber be best constituted to fulfil its new role?

These are some of the basic questions posed in the initiative indicated in the Throne Speech by the "Renewal of the Constitution." I respectfully suggest we would be remiss in our duty if we did not in our deliberations go beyond the mere question of drafting a new document to be entitled "The Constitution of Canada," and inquire in depth into these deeper and very real issues that affect our policy and underlie any document purporting to be our Constitution. This discussion and research, I suggest, should encompass not only the question of parliamentary reform but also that of electoral reform, including such basic questions as the various alternatives to proportional representation and their current validity on the Canadian political scene. We should be grateful indeed to Her Majesty for the broad concepts outlined in the Throne Speech which have given us the opportunity of deep and searching inquiry into these very real questions which will affect the future well-being of our country if we are to "renew" our Constitution in any real, meaningful, and lasting sense.

Probably I would not have been moved to take part in this debate had it not been for the references in the speech of Senator Bird to the contributions of those who, in two great world conflicts, gave so much to this land they loved so dearly. Any thought that there was anything so fundamentally wrong with the Constitution of our country as it then existed was surely dispelled by the sacrifices they made. They, more than any, believed in a more just, a more free and a better Canada; but first they believed in Canada. We are not a militaristic nation, and our history and our contribution to the betterment of mankind can scarcely be founded on our military might or accomplishment. Our glory and accomplishment, which is great indeed, rests on no "Napoleonic Vision Of Military Grandeur" or "Empire Upon Which The Sun Never Sets", but on the contribution of those who did play a very real and worthy part in preventing the light of freedom, upon which we knew Canada's future rested, from being extinguished throughout the world. That is a real, vital and important part in our history, and I suggest that no solemn and lasting judgment such as the "Renewal of our Constitution" can be embarked upon without consideration of the values for which those men and women stood and for which so many gave all they had to give.

It is an uncontrovertible historical fact that, in a political sense, Canada's participation in two great world conflicts was divisive; but for the many who voluntarily chose to serve, in the belief that their duty to their country lay in such a decision, their participation was a unifying and not a divisive factor in our nation's history. There are no members of the Royal Canadian Legion who attend the national conventions and who wear proudly their Legion berets at a more rakish angle, and who pin on their service medals and decorations with more pride, than the boys from the Legion branches in the Province of Quebec. The first to be shot down of the City of Saskatoon Squadron, on which I had the privilege of serving, was my friend from Trois Rivières, Louis Cloutier, who before we went overseas used to say to me:

It's all right for you, Joe. When you go home you are a big hero, but when I go home to Trois Rivières they throw stones at me.

There is no doubt that for Louis and his Francophone brethren, so many of whom chose to serve, the choice was a more difficult one, and their love for Canada must often have been even greater than that of us WASPs from Toronto. On the City of Saskatoon Squadron were names like Mass and Kazakoff, neither of which, so far as I have ever been able to discern, was either WASP or Francophone. So for us the war was not a divisive factor but one which brought young men and women from all regions of Canada and all its ethnic components together under one common cause called Canada.

I recently had the opportunity of reviewing the histories and citations of the winners of our highest military decoration, the Victoria Cross. It does not read as the litany of any one racial or regional component of our land, but as a heterogeneous list, which is the essence of Canada itself. In it we find these names:

WILLIAM AVERY BISHOP, born in Owen Sound, Ontario, on February 8, 1894. He enlisted with the 4th Canadian Mounted Rifles. In 1915 he transferred to the Royal Flying Corps. As a pilot "Billy" Bishop accounted for 72 enemy planes and two balloons, including 25 enemy machines in 12 days and five on his last day in action. At the end of the war he held the rank of lieutenant-colonel and had been awarded the Victoria Cross, the Distinguished Service Order and Bar, the Military Cross, the Distinguished Flying Cross, the French Legion of Honour and the French Croix de Guerre.

JEAN BRILLANT, born in Assametsquaghan, Matapedia County, Quebec, on March 15, 1890. In 1915 he enlisted for overseas service with the 189th Battalion, which later merged with the 22nd Battalion in France. The action described in his citation occurred on August 8 and 9, 1918, east of Meharicourt during the Battle of Amiens. Lieutenant Brillant died of wounds on August 10.

MILTON FOWLER GREGG, born in Mountain Dale, Kings County, New Brunswick, on April 10, 1892. In September 1914 he enlisted as a private in the 13th Canadian Infantry Battalion (Black Watch) and proceeded overseas. In 1916 he was commissioned in the field and posted to the Royal Canadian Regiment. In action he won the Military Cross at Lens in 1917, a Bar to the Cross at Arras in 1918 and the Victoria Cross at Cambrai in the same year.

Milton Gregg served his country with much distinction in peace as well as in war.

GEORGE RANDOLPH PEARKES, born in Watford, England, on February 26, 1888. He enlisted as a private in the 2nd Canadian Mounted Rifles, and he was granted a commission in France and went to the 5th C.M.R., winning rapid promotion to lieutenant-colonel. The action described in his citation took place on October 30 and 31, 1917, during the fighting before Passchendaele. Lieutenant-Colonel Pearkes also won the Military Cross at the Somme in 1917, and the Distinguished Service Order at Amiens in 1918.

Although George Pearkes, was born in England, he was a British Columbian through and through. He served his country in war and peace and, irrespective of one's political affiliations, he won the admiration of all Canadians who have taken the trouble to read something of their history. He was distinguished not only in his war service but in Parliament and in the Treasury benches, and finally as the Queen's Representative in British Columbia.

DAVID VIVIAN CURRIE, born in Sutherland, Saskatchewan, on July 8, 1912. He enlisted for active service in 1939. The action described in his citation took place in Normandy on August 18, 19 and 20, 1944.

David Currie not only served his country proudly in war but he served us here in Parliament faithfully and effectively for so many years.

JOHN WEIR FOOTE, born in Madoc, Ontario, on May 5, 1904. At the outbreak of the Second World War he enlisted in the Canadian Chaplain Services and was posted to the Royal Hamilton Light Infantry. The action described in his citation occurred at Dieppe on August 19, 1942.

John Foote was the first member of the Canadian Chaplain Services ever to win the Victoria Cross.

ROBERT HAMPTON GRAY, born in Trail, British Columbia, on November 2, 1917. In 1940 he was commissioned in the Navy and qualified as a pilot in the Fleet Air Arm. For his brilliant work during an attack on the German battleship Tirpitz in Alten Fjord he was Mentioned in Dispatches. In July 1945 he was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross for aiding in the destruction of a destroyer in the Tokyo area, and on August 9, 1945, he won the Victoria Cross for his action off the Island of Honshu, Mainland Japan.

CHARLES CECIL INGERSOLL MERRITT, born in Vancouver, British Columbia, on November 10, 1908. An officer in the Seaforth Highlanders of Canada, he transferred to the South Saskatchewan Regiment in 1942. The action described in his citation took place at Dieppe on August 19, 1942. Following his gallant action at Dieppe he became a prisoner of war for the balance of hostilities.

Charles Merritt was another of those who continued to serve his country in peacetime as effectively and dutifully as he had done in wartime.

PAUL TRIQUET, born in Cabano, Québec, on April 2, 1910. He enlisted as a private in the Royal 22e Régiment on November 3, 1927, and received rapid promotion. The action which won him the Victoria Cross took place at Casa Berardi on December 14, 1943. He was also awarded a French decoration—Chevalier of the Legion of Honour—for the same action.

Paul Triquet in some sense epitomized Canada, having served in the regiment Vingt Deuxième Royal de Québec, which the rest of us, in goodwill and not in ignorance, irreverently but lovingly, always referred to as the "Vandoos".

While I am on the litany of Canada's war heroes, I would be remiss, indeed, if I did not recall the name of our own Ottawa Valley boy from Carleton Place, Lieutenant Roy Brown, who accomplished so much for the morale of all allied troops when he did the impossible in shooting down the theretofore invincible "Red Baron" of the German air force.

It is not my purpose here to advance the glorification of war but only to assure everyone that we recall that the "Renewal of our Constitution" does not mean there was any fundamental defect in the document produced by the men at Charlottetown, which prevented our having a glorious and proud history in both war and peace. We have indeed had a proud and glorious history under our existing Constitution which, in most of the rest of the world, has made Canada "the cynosure of all eyes and the envy of all hearts." Yes, let us renew our Constitution if the times so require, but let us do so on the basis of building on the great heritage bequeathed from the past rather than on a wrong concept that we do not already have a great heritage upon which to build.

I would remind honourable senators that the shoulder badges worn by the men and women of our armed forces in World Wars I and II did not say "Québec" or "Ontario" or "Prairie Provinces" or "British Columbia" or "Atlantic Provinces", but each indelibly and clearly said "Canada."

Of recent years the voice of what Sir John A. Macdonald used to call "the parish pump" has been heard more loudly and more stridently than that of the great cataracts like Niagara Falls, Churchill Falls and others which can outflow all the parish pumps put together, and which stand for the whole of Canada together greater than all of its individual parts. I suggest that in all parts of this land are men and women in all age groups who love this great country as dearly as those who gave so much in war. With God's help, their contribution to the further renewal and development of our country will be made in the pursuits of peace rather than those of war.

But I suggest that while some of them may have been temporarily bemused by the loud voices from the parish pump, whether in the name of "western alienation," "British Columbian alienation," "Atlantic alienation" or the raucous voice of racism—the chief weapon of every political demagogue seeking power and self-aggrandizement, from Attila the Hun to Adolph Hitler—they long to hear the voice of Canada itself crescendoing clearly over any ephemeral gurglings from the parish pump. It is surely for us here in the Thirtieth Parliament of Canada to provide that clarion call of Canada itself which they so long to hear.

Let us not deceive ourselves that we can strengthen the whole by merely acceding to the cries of the past. Yes, we should be prepared to make changes where such changes are required, in the name of justice and equity, which will make Canada itself stronger as a whole; but we must also have the courage to stand firm in defence of those institutions and that portion of our history which have already made Canada great. To paraphrase the old Anglican prayer, may we recognize those things which require change and those which should be retained and built upon; may we have the wisdom to discern the difference and the courage to act accordingly. I appreciate that here in the Senate it will take particular courage to fulfil this dictum in that the retention of anything from our past history is prone to be interpreted as a self-serving argument.

I am encouraged and emboldened by the speeches of the mover and the seconder, and by the calibre of the performance I have witnessed in the past from the majority of the members of this chamber, to feel confident that the Senate of Canada will do its duty in the best interests of the whole of our great land, so that at the end of this vast process of constitutional renewal, history will record that the Senate of Canada, assembled in the Fourth Session of the Thirtieth Parliament of Canada, served our country well.

The Conference of First Ministers to take place shortly may afford the opportunity of progress on the "Renewal of the Constitution" more expeditiously than was envisaged in the earlier approach, which contemplated the revision of the subject matters deemed to be clearly within the federal ambit of authority, and a later and second stage encompassing the division of powers and the "amending formula." I think it is clear to all that it would be preferable to amend the Constitution in one document, and that the "amending formula" and the division of powers as between federal and provincial jurisdictions is the real essence of any such complete amendment.

The Prime Minister's initiative of proceeding with Phase I, Federal Powers, was in order that some definite progress might be made after so many years of federal-provincial discussion without any real or apparent progress. That initiative has led to a broad national discussion and to such concrete results as the report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution, and the report of the Canadian Bar Association's Special Committee on the Constitution. From these as well as from other discussions and papers, both from the academic and the popular level, has emanated a current of public interest and a plethora of ideas that may make possible a current solution to the problem which would not have been possible previously.

It should be recalled that the Victoria Charter—the ultimate resolution of the "Fulton-Favreau Formula"—was the consensus of a just amending formula by the leaders of nine of the ten provinces. The fact that its basis was the result of the efforts of two such distinguished Canadians as the Honourable Davie Fulton and the late Honourable Guy Favreau renders this solution as close to a bipartisan one as is likely to be achieved. I think all honourable senators will agree that the process of constitution-making should be a truly national one, rising over and above any political or partisan consideration.

It is not likely that the leaders from the provinces which accepted the Victoria Charter could recant or alter the position of their regions at this date. It is possible that they might even be persuaded to make concessions which would make the formula more acceptable to the people of the Province of Québec. If at the same time agreement could largely be reached on the question of distribution of powers, we would have the essentials of a "made-in-Canada Constitution" ready to offer to the people of Canada.

The instruments of direct democracy such as the referendum were rejected early in our history when the early "Clear Grit" radicals failed to establish their contention that such instruments of "republicanism" suited a parliamentary democracy. However, times have changed, and I believe that in this day the people of Canada would welcome a direct voice in the constitution-making process. If in the months ahead we can achieve an accord that would implement an equitable amending formula in the revised distribution of powers, I suggest that a new constitution so conceived be put to a plebiscite in conjunction with the next federal election. If a favourable majority in the plebiscite could be achieved in the other regions of Canada, we could at the same time clearly say from the federal level to the people of Québec, "Here is your plebiscite. Here is a Constitution which protects your linguistic and human rights, which provides a just formula for future amendment, which will guarantee you those rights in perpetuity; a vote in favour of this new Constitution will be a vote that you, the people of Québec, wish to be part of this new and more just Canada." A favourable result would clearly indicate that the people themselves in the Province of Québec wish to remain in Canada, and that any future plebiscite Mr. Lévesque might have up his sleeve would be but surplusage.

I realize that such an endeavour is not easy, but with the support of all federal parties I believe such a procedure could be successful in all regions in Canada. Whatever government is successful in the election would have a clear mandate from the people themselves not only to pass in the Parliament a new Constitution for Canada, but to approach Her Majesty the Queen, as Head of State of the United Kingdom, to instruct her minister there to pass their final bill relating to Canada—which I respectfully suggest will be necessary if we are to put our constitutional housekeeping in final good order.

Unlike the maniacs, we do not seek to build for a thousand years. The future human needs are too uncertain to enable any rational human being to do so. But I do suggest that we may conceive a Constitution which will serve our people as well, and enable them to thrive and work together, as did our forebears at Charlottetown some 114 years ago. If we can accomplish this, as I believe we can, the Fathers of the Renewed Constitution will indeed be those who serve in the Fourth Session of the Thirtieth Parliament of Canada. Their place in history will rest on sure and secure ground.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of the text of a proposed Order in Council authorizing the issuance of a proclamation for the establishment of a Ministry of State for Economic Development, pursuant to section 18 of the Ministries and Ministers of State Act, Chapter 14 (2nd Supplement), R.S.C., 1970.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the first report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, and I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes and Proceedings of the Senate of this day, to form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[For text of report see Appendix "A", p. 329.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Olson moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Thursday, 7th December 1978, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

RETURN OF COSSETTE-TRUDELS TO CANADA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have the answers to a number of questions that have been posed in recent days.

Senator Asselin asked a series of questions yesterday with respect to the Cossette-Trudels. He wanted to know whether in fact these people were interested in returning to Canada. As of this date I am able to report the following:

I cannot confirm reports that the French Ministry for Foreign Affairs would oppose the return to Canada of the Cossette-Trudels as alluded to in press reports.

To the question does the Canadian government intend to consult with the French authorities on the return to Canada of the Cossette-Trudels, as a matter of courtesy, the Canadian government would advise the French authorities if and when the Cossette-Trudels wish to return to Canada.

In reply to the question as to whether there has been any contact between the Canadian government representatives and the Cossette-Trudels, again I emphasize that as of today's date, December 6, neither has there been contact with the Department of External Affairs nor our posts abroad. As I have stated before, should they indicate a desire to return to Canada, the embassy in Paris has been authorized to issue emergency passports for their return to Canada only.

The other questions asked by Senator Asselin are presently under consideration by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

POST OFFICE

INCREASE IN POSTAL RATES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Forsey asked a question on November 22 with respect to the government's intention in the matter of raising the postal rates in April. He asked whether the government intended to proceed in what appears not only to him, but to the Statutory Instruments Committee and, indeed, to both houses, to be the proper manner, namely, by an amendment to the Post Office Act, or whether it proposes to repeat what it has done on two previous occasions and proceed in what the two houses have declared to be an improper manner, namely, by regulation under the Financial Administration Act.

I am informed that, yes, indeed, the government intends to use section 13(b) of the Financial Administration Act, relying on the decision of August 2, 1978, in Bartholomew Green 1751 Association Incorporated, carrying on business as The Canadian Periodical Publishers' Association, and The Sur- vival Foundation, carrying on business as The Canadian Forum v. Attorney General of Canada, (1978) Federal Court Reports, 391.

ENERGY

AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA ON PRICE OF OIL AND GAS— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Olson asked a question on November 28 with regard to the agreement between Alberta and the federal government respecting the dates for an increase in gas and oil prices. He stated:

... there are some inclusive reports emanating from the Conference of First Ministers that there is a new, or at least an amended, agreement—

Honourable senators, as to crude oil pricing, I understand that discussions are still going on between the two governments, taking into account the views expressed at the First Ministers' Conference on the economy.

As to gas pricing, the one-year agreement between Canada and Alberta relating to the price of gas to existing domestic markets, which became effective August 1, 1978, is expected to run its course.

The federal and Alberta governments have discussed the conditions, including price, for achieving an expansion of natural gas markets in Canada. The elements of this discussion are set out in a short statement which was used at the First Ministers' Conference and which I am now tabling in both official languages.

[The statement follows:]

ELEMENTS EXAMINED IN FEDERAL-ALBERTA DISCUSSIONS ON EXPANDING NATURAL GAS MARKETS IN CANADA

The following principles are agreed in respect of expansion of gas markets:

1. Alberta will make gas available at an incentive price (i.e. below the price established from time to time for gas to be sold in existing markets);
2. The incentive price will be available for a fixed duration (including provision for phase-out);
3. In new markets east of Alberta; and
4. The incentive price will be rolled-in at the Alberta border with the price of gas sold to existing markets and to export so that all producers continue to receive a "single-price."

Mechanisms for implementation of these arrangements will be developed by a Federal-Alberta Task Force, with full consultation with each affected consuming province.

Achievement of gas market expansion will require congruent actions by federal and provincial governments and industry, including, by way of example:

1. Comparable tax treatment of gas and oil products in the market place;

[Senator Perrault.]

2. Actions to take surplus fuel oil capacity off the market by refinery rationalization and oil product exports;

3. "Attitudinal changes" to gas use which could be encouraged by government statements; and

4. More flexible regulatory treatment of gas distributors.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

USE FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the distinguished Leader of the Opposition, Senator Flynn, asked a question on November 29 and, as I read the account of the proceedings of that day, for some unaccountable reason he seems to question the motives of the government. He stated:

It appeared to me then, and it still appears to me now, that the government was trying not so much to punish a possible theft or fraud as to share in the fruits of such activities.

Honourable senators, this is a statement completely uncharacteristic of the Leader of the Opposition. He made this remark in connection with the cashing of interest or dividend payments and the demand that social insurance numbers be produced. Honourable senators will recall that question.

The Deputy Leader of the Opposition expressed other concerns relating to the requirements of a social insurance number by individuals when cashing bond interest coupons and the 25 per cent withholding by the encashing agent when the number cannot be provided.

I am informed that a total of approximately $619,000 has been withheld from bond interest coupons cashed by individuals unable to provide a social insurance number. This amount is the accumulated total of such withholdings since July 1, 1977, the date on which the new requirement was imposed pursuant to Bill C-22. It should be emphasized that the 25 per cent withholding is neither a penalty nor a definitive tax; rather, it constitutes an amount withheld on account of a possible tax liability, from which credit for the withholding is allowed upon filing an income tax return by the individual. It should be pointed out, therefore, that the total withholding to date of $619,000 does not represent a general revenue fund to the government since any withholding in excess of an individual's calculated tax liability is refunded when that individual files the tax return.

I want to emphasize that the $619,000 is not a general revenue fund to the government.

Senator Flynn: That's not bad. It's not peanuts.

Senator Perrault: As some taxpayers had not been reporting as income the full amount of bond interest payments, a suitable method of identification had to be considered. Since the social insurance number had been found to be an efficient means of identifying individuals for other government programs, its use for identification of bond interest recipients was adopted.

The Honourable A. C. Abbott, the Minister of National Revenue, said, and I quote from the statement provided to me:

I can assure you, however, that the intent at the time of enactment of the legislation was only to ensure a more efficient and equitable administration of the law, and in no way was it to interfere with the civil liberties or privacy of the Canadian people.

TRANSPORTATION

LANDING RIGHTS OF CANADIAN AND BRITISH AIRLINES— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on November 21 last Senator Molson asked whether any information was available regarding the negotiations taking place between Canada and the United Kingdom respecting landing rights for Canadian airlines at Heathrow. I am now in a position to respond to that question, as follows:

The air negotiations currently under way between the Canadian and British governments are at the request of the British and are concerned with the renegotiation of the bilateral air agreement between the two countries. The main issues are routes and traffic rights, including access to western Canada for British Airways. Two rounds have already taken place, in April and October 1978, and the next round is scheduled for early 1979.

These negotiations are separate from the proposal by the British authorities that Air Canada move its London operations from Heathrow to Gatwick. The proposal is outside the scope of the bilateral agreement. According to the British, the move of certain blocks of traffic from Heathrow is essential because of severe and increasing congestion at Heathrow. It is also proposed that the airlines of Spain and Portugal move to Gatwick. In all cases parallel services by British Airways would also be transferred to Gatwick. Air Canada opposes this move and has had a number of meetings with the British authorities. The Canadian government is keeping fully apprised of the situation and the matter has been raised in discussions between ministers of both countries at which Canadian ministers have expressed concern about the proposed British action.

Under the present Canada-United Kingdom air agreement, which dates back to 1949, only British Airways, as the British designated carrier, is authorized to operate scheduled services to Canada from the United Kingdom. The major traffic points that British Airways is entitled to serve are Montreal and Toronto. Under the agreement the United Kingdom also has landing rights at several minor points in Canada such as Gander and Churchill but it does not operate to these points. Air Canada is the Canadian designated carrier for scheduled services to the United Kingdom and operates to the authorized points, London and Prestwick.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

THE NEW FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a rather lengthy reply in response to a series of questions on the subject of the selection of new fighter aircraft for Canada's armed forces. Honourable senators will recall that there was a rather lively exchange on this subject on November 28 last.

I have before me a statement on Motions made by the Minister of National Defence in the other place. It is too lengthy to be read by me during this oral Question Period. It fully details the process and reasoning behind the decision to eliminate four of the six competing aircraft.

As honourable senators know, the finalists will be the General Dynamics CF-16 and the McDonnell-Douglas/Northrop CF-18A.

Perhaps I might take this opportunity to briefly highlight the salient points given in the statement on Motions by the minister.

Our numerical requirement of between 130 and 150 aircraft is critical to our capability to meet our domestic and European commitments. The minister expressed his disappointment that the procurement of sufficient numbers of F-14s, F-15s, or Tornados could not be accommodated within our set budget of $2.34 billion, and that amount is in August 1977 dollars. The evaluation revealed that acquisition of a mixed fleet would bring little or no benefit in terms of fleet size, and that operation of such a fleet would bring substantial liabilities including double training and logistic support systems over the lifespan of the aircraft.

The two most severe constraints that Canada faces, and will continue to face, are the number of aircraft required and the set amount of money to buy them. Our task then is buy the best military aircraft available within these constraints while seeking the best possible industrial benefits for Canada with a minimum of project risk.

One of the finalists, the CF-16 is a single-engine aircraft which has been selected by five of our NATO allies, including the United States. Should the CF-16 be acquired, Canada would, of course, have extensive commonality with NATO allies in Europe. While this aircraft does not have the degree of sophistication of the larger aircraft, it does have an acceptable capability and is the only aircraft which at this point meets the numbers required.

The other fighter remaining in the competition, the CF-18A, offers us another set of possibilities. It may be more expensive than the CF-16 would be, and therefore we can expect to acquire fewer, although the minister is optimistic that an adequate number to meet our roles can be acquired in negotiations. Perhaps the purchase of this aircraft will allow for co-operative logistics arrangements with the United States. On the other hand, being a twin-engined somewhat larger aircraft, the CF-18A offers some definite advantages of its own. These include a greater potential for growth or capability to be fitted with new systems that may be necessary to cater to future demands made of a fighter aircraft. The CF-18A also currently has more advanced all-weather capabilities in the context of sovereignty protection and air defence.

Finally, as honourable senators may appreciate, there are pros and cons to both types of aircraft. Assurances can be provided that there were also some pros and cons to all aircraft that have now been eliminated from the competition. Canada's request for proposals provided a standard which enabled us to obtain truly comparable data for all contenders. No single aircraft could possibly have met all specifications given in the request for proposals, nor was it the government's intention to acquire an aircraft whose capabilities far exceeded those required to adequately carry out the assessed roles.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

USE FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Opposition a question?

An Hon. Senator: The Leader of the Opposition?

Senator Smith (Colchester): I am sorry, I am anticipating things to come in a very short time. I apologize to the Leader of the Government for my anticipatory verbiage. As an excuse I will say I was just getting in practice.

May I ask the Leader of the Government a question relating to the signed statement of the Minister of National Revenue on the effect of legislation concerning social insurance numbers, and the requirement to produce a social insurance number before one can obtain the full amount of money due on coupons cut from Canadians bonds? Does this, in fact, relate to coupons on bonds sold to the Canadian public before the legislation was passed? If so, were those bonds not sold on the understanding that the purchaser had the right to cash the coupons without production of any document or a social insurance number?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall take that question as notice.

Senator Flynn: As a supplementary question to that, I would ask, with regard to the amount that has been withheld or remitted to the government, if the Department of National Revenue has any figures indicating how much of this amount has been credited to taxpayers and how much is left in the government coffers.

● (1420)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that information will be sought as an ancillary to the answer to the question posed by Senator Smith.

Senator Grosart: Would the Leader of the Government accept a suggestion that at some subsequent date he give a somewhat more complete answer to the question? His answer seems to me to ignore the most essential part of my question, which was: Is not this method of withholding money unless the social insurance number is given in direct—I emphasize “direct”—contradiction to an undertaking given by the government that the social insurance number would never be used for this kind of purpose?

The honourable senator quoted the minister as saying it was found that this was “a suitable method.” I have no doubt it was. He said the minister found that this was “efficient.” I have no doubt it was. But these are old, impossible and intolerable excuses for any government going back on its undertakings. Therefore, I would ask that at a subsequent sitting—perhaps early in the new year, if Parliament is not dissolved by then—he give us a full answer to that question, which I think is important. It may well be that the whole matter should be reviewed, and that these social insurance identification numbers should be used for other purposes. I don't know. However, I am concerned if this use is contrary to a clear assurance given when Parliament assented to the setting up of this type of identification of individuals.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

THE NEW FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: I should like to refer to the statement the government leader made about defence aircraft, and to express the hope that the paper to which he referred gives us a little more information to go on than the statement he made today. My principal point has to do with my request as to whether or not the statement covers the strategic philosophy which lies behind the selection of aircraft. No mention was made of that in the statement.

The reason I am concerned is that one of these types of aircraft will be used for the overflight of our Arctic areas, and if a single-engine aircraft, like the F-16, is chosen, we can anticipate trouble. That point is underlined by the fact that he told us the F-16 was selected by six NATO partners, including the United States. But for what purpose? If the purpose is different from the purpose we have in mind for our Arctic responsibilities, I think that point should be considered.

My principal reason in rising is to ask the Leader of the Government whether the strategic considerations that lie behind the criteria laid down for the selection of aircraft for Canadian defence in Canada and NATO are covered in the statement to which he referred. If they are not, I hope he will be able to give us that information in another form.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I suggest that the statement made on Motions by the Minister of National Defence be printed as an appendix to today's proceedings? Honourable senators may wish to read the complete document, and if they feel dissatisfied with certain aspects of it, further information will be sought. I am prepared to support that action.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SEARCH FOR MISSING VESSEL—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government concerning the loss of the fishing vessel, known as the Barra Cudina, off the southwest coast of Newfoundland. In view of the fact that it appears that Search and Rescue—for which I have the greatest admiration—has failed to find the vessel, would the Leader of the Opposition—this is catching, honourable senators—would the Leader of the Government ask the Minister of Transport if an inquiry could be held into the loss of the Barra Cudina in order to clarify the position, and hopefully prevent further losses?

Senator Flynn: On a question of privilege. I assure the Leader of the Government that it is not by design that this accident has happened twice today.

Senator Grosart: Some senators have been reading the polls.

Senator Perrault: I presumed, perhaps incorrectly, that the question was directed to me. There seems to be a “Galluping” disease across the way today which is causing a misdirection of questions.

Honourable senators, that important question will be put to the appropriate authorities this afternoon to see if perhaps we can obtain an immediate reply.

Senator Grosart: I assure the Leader of the Government that, far from being a galloping disease, it is a remarkable recovery.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I expect for some it will soon be a fatal disease.

UNITED NATIONS

NAMIBIA—CANADIAN FORCES CONTINGENT—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question of which I gave him very brief notice indeed. It has to do with the country now known as Namibia in many places, known once, I think, as Southwest Africa. Has the Government of Canada made a decision, either final or tentative, to provide a contingent of Canadian armed forces to any United Nations force that may be sent to that country in connection with the proposed United Nations elections?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators are aware that Canada has played a very constructive role in attempting to resolve the problem that exists in that part of the world. However, I have received no current information with respect to a possible deployment of Canadian troops, so the question must be taken as notice.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SEA AND AIR FREIGHT SERVICES—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a further question to put to the distinguished Leader of the Government.

It has to do with a letter of November 28 from myself to the Minister of Transport concerning the cutback and downgrading of freight services to Newfoundland by sea and air. Since this action contravenes a commitment that rail freight services would be maintained and no lay-offs would occur until the final report of the Sullivan Commission on Transportation in Newfoundland is published, would the Senate leader provide the information, which is of concern to many Newfoundlanders?

Senator Flynn: Senator Perrault is the government leader in the Senate, not the Senate leader.

Senator Marshall: Would the distinguished government leader in the Senate give that information?

Senator Perrault: The information requested will be sought and produced as quickly as possible.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SALE OF LABRADOR LINERBOARD MILL LTD.—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say that I have made inquiries again today with respect to the DREE industrial proposal referred to frequently by Senator Marshall in recent days. The day on which the honourable senator asked his first question marked a meeting between the Honourable Marcel Lessard and his counterpart in the Newfoundland government in an attempt to achieve some useful solution. However, no final statement on the matter is yet available for the Senate.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

REMOVAL OF SUBSIDY TO MILLERS OF WHEAT—QUESTION

Senator Benidickson: I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government. Honourable senators will be aware that for a week or more in the other place there have been daily questions relating to the announcement of the government's intention to remove the subsidy to millers on domestically consumed wheat. We have also read various estimates of what this might mean to consumers at the end of the line buying a 24-ounce loaf of bread. Justifiably perhaps the President of the National Farmers' Union, convening in this city, who has been in office for a number of years, says that the actual cost to the bakeries would be three-and-a-half cents a loaf. We have read about estimates that the subsidy elimination might mean an increase in price of 12 cents per loaf to the consumer; we have other estimates that it might mean an increase in price of five cents per loaf, and so on.

Would the Leader of the Government inform this chamber of the present conclusions of either the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or the offshoot of the former AIB, which is called the CSIP, as to what consumers may, in the opinion of these government agencies, have to anticipate in this respect? What teeth and clout are available to the CSIP on the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in monitoring this type of possible price rip-off, or are they toothless tigers?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as far as the increase in the price of bread is concerned, I attempted to answer that question on November 30, and what I said is reported at pages 296 and 297 of the Debates of the Senate of that day.

It is estimated by officials in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that a fair increase in price of a loaf of bread would range from 5 to 7 cents. There have been reports of increases which would range as high as 12 cents of loaf. The government has no control over the mark-ups charged by certain bakeries across the country. It is not the present intention of the government to become involved in a price control system involving the price of bakery products.

There is an experimental program about to be launched in the greater Vancouver area of British Columbia, sponsored by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, which would provide an information number for consumers. I understand that consumers will very shortly be able to call this information number and be able to learn about the best and most advantageous purchasing possibilities for a range of goods, commodities and staple items. This information will be assembled by personnel of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

On a contrary basis, however, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is engaged in a program of collecting statistical data and information with respect to consumer products. Guidance is provided, when requested, for consumers on matters which affect their interests.

Senator Benidickson: Would the leader, in due course, reply to the other part of my question specifically as to the actual authority and powers of the government's new so-called pricing watchdog agency, the CSIP, a successor or an adjunct to the AIB that is about to expire but which we have had—with benefits, in my opinion—for several years?

Senator Perrault: That portion of the question will be taken as notice.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

THIRD READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Thompson for the third reading of Bill S-7, to implement conventions between Canada and the Republic of Korea and Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and an agreement between Canada and Jamaica for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, in the absence of the sponsor of this bill, I may say that I undertook that my remarks at this time would not be controversial, so I see no reason why at their conclusion, if there are no other speakers, this bill should not be given third reading. It may be important, in relation to time, that we do that before the Christmas recess.

I rise at this time because I did say on second reading that I would attempt on third reading to clear up what may have been some confusion arising out of my suggestion that this measure, Bill S-7, might properly have been referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. I did not insist on that because I recognized the fact that there are precedents and other good reasons why we should continue to send a bill such as this to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I have not changed my opinion on that.

The confusion may have arisen because of the somewhat anomalous position in which Parliament at this particular time is being asked to implement conventions and agreements—actually, treaties—which Parliament has not approved. This is the anomaly that I indicated earlier is of some importance. The fact of the matter is that under our constitutional usage, under historic practices, Parliament has no control whatsoever over the signing and ratification of international undertakings of any kind between Canada and other countries.

I think it is time that this matter is discussed in Parliament, and a solution found. I have spent some time in my life studying international law, and I believe it is quite correct to say that the executive in Canada could today conclude a treaty with one foreign country undertaking, on behalf of Canada, to go to war with another country on January 1. There is legally nothing to prevent that—if my reading of the authorities is correct. In my opinion, this is a situation that should not carry on indefinitely.

There are, of course, constraints. There are built-in conventional constraints. There have been statements made by former Prime Ministers, particularly the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, who made a general declaration, which was subscribed to by both houses of Parliament, that normally the executive would not enter into a major agreement or treaty—and he specified the kinds of international undertakings that might be included in that caveat—without consultation with or consent by Parliament, or both. That has not always been adhered to. He made the interesting exception that this did not, of course, apply to an exchange of notes. The result is something like 80 per cent of all such undertakings since have been in that form—the form that was specifically exempted.

This is a device of our experts in External Affairs. It is quite understandable that those who have the responsibility of negotiating these important undertakings would have some reservations as to the point at which they would have to disclose the negotiations or the intentions, but it seems to me, before an undertaking of any kind binding Canada—if it does bind Canada—with any other nation is signed and ratified, that surely Parliament should at least be informed and, in my view, should be asked to approve or otherwise.

A number of senators said that if we pass this bill we are surely ratifying these treaties. We are not. They have already been ratified. They have been signed. Morally, at least,

Canada is obligated by their terms. Why do we have the bill? The bill is before us because it is necessary to implement these undertakings, which have already been made, by amendments to domestic legislation, and, in this case, amendments to our tax legislation.

I suggest to honourable senators that it is absurd for us to be asked to implement undertakings—they are called conventions and agreements in this case—which have already been signed. It is true they have been tabled in Parliament, but surely Parliament should have been consulted. Parliament should in all cases be consulted before a signature on behalf of Canada is affixed to any document.

We will hear from External Affairs that it is impossible; there are hundreds of these. Well, it is still my view that Canada should not be committed to an international undertaking of any kind without the approval of Parliament.

In the Question Period this afternoon, Senator G. I. Smith asked whether we have made any undertakings with respect to peacekeeping in Namibia. This points up the whole situation. There may have been an undertaking. At this point it is necessary for a senator if he wants to find out whether we are committed to sending troops into this very dangerous area, to ask the executive if we have already undertaken to do so. We do not know, at this moment.

I may say it is true that it has been the practice generally for Parliament to be consulted before there have been definite commitments in international peacekeeping. It is because this is a new form of international undertaking that has developed in the last 20 years, which is rather different from a treaty, agreement, convention, or undertaking of any kind between two or more countries. It just happens to be between Canada and an international agency, the United Nations. This, however, does not affect the general principle. As I said, this is an illustration of the fact that Parliament can be kept completely in the dark about international undertakings on behalf of Canada.

Senator Hayden quite rightly pointed out that the bill before us deals with tax legislation. Therefore, it makes good sense that a bill, which, in fact, amends the existing tax legislation, should go to our expert committee on tax matters. This raises the question: If there were a convention dealing largely with agriculture, should it be referred to the Agriculture Committee, the Transport and Communications Committee, or which committee? I am inclined to think that that makes sense because we have developed a special expertise in these committees. However, this can mean that we are sending these conventions to be examined in committee when Canada has already signed them. So, if the bill failed to pass, Canada would be in the position of having to go to its co-signatories and saying, "We have to renege, even though we have signed."

One of the treaties covered by this bill was signed by a former Leader of the Government in this chamber, a former Secretary of State for External Affairs and now the High Commissioner in London, the Honourable Paul Martin. We are being asked now to implement that.

My suggestion, therefore, is that this is a particular matter that the Senate should examine in detail. We are dealing with an historic anachronism. I don't wish to go into the whole history, but it goes back to the principle of the prerogative of the Crown, and that goes back to the days when the King was not merely the King of Britain but also the Duke of Normandy, the Elector of Hanover—as he was at one time—and the effective king of Maine, Anjou, or anywhere in France or beyond France. When the King made war, Parliament told him that it could be none of their business, and that he could go to war for the other countries if he wished. They told him that if he needed money he could come to them. Of course, that was the situation that brought about the whole modern concept of parliamentary control—parliamentary control of taxation and expenditures.

We do not have that problem today because one of the obvious restrictions on the unlimited use of this prerogative of the Crown is the right of Parliament to refuse to grant supply for those purposes. The fact of the matter is that the most dangerous types of international undertaking entered into may require no money from Parliament, such as a decision to go to war. Parliament could subsequently say that it will not provide the money, but in the meantime there could have been a declaration of war, or an undertaking to declare war, by Canada. That is a decision, I suggest, that is quite proper for this chamber to look into.

I have raised questions on the nomenclature, and someone said that this was quibbling and that it did not matter if an undertaking were called a treaty, convention or agreement or one of the 20 other names mentioned to identify these types of agreements. Well, it does matter. At the present time the United States Congress is dealing with the very important question of the passage or otherwise of the SALT agreement, one of the most important international agreements of our time. President Carter's administration is probably having some difficulty because of the recent election results. Some of those who would have supported it, particularly in the Senate, are not there anymore, and they may not be able to get the two-thirds majority required to pass it. Well, what is their solution? It is to call it an agreement, the approval of which requires only a straight majority.

This is the kind of situation which can arise, and which makes it important for Canada to come up with clear definitions when it deals with these conventions, agreements, treaties, exchanges of letters, exchanges of notes, and so forth.

It has been suggested by various authorities who have looked into the matter that this is a very proper role for the Senate. It might well be—and I was surprised that there was not more discussion of it in the recent considerations of constitutional change—a very proper role for the Senate to examine in advance all such agreements before they are signed or ratified. That would be a proper role for the second chamber because, normally, we have more time, and perhaps, more facilities to conduct the kind of examination that is necessary before we carry on any further with this anomaly. If something is not done about it, Canada may get into serious trouble.

Therefore, after consultation with Senator van Roggen, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, a committee of which I happen to be the Deputy Chairman, I will move in the near future that the whole matter of parliamentary information about and approval of all international agreements entered into on behalf of Canada be referred to that committee.

Senator Goldenberg: Would the honourable senator allow a question?

Senator Grosart: Of course.

Senator Goldenberg: Is he suggesting that the practice which he has been criticizing is confined to Canada? I understand that it is the general practice in international relations for treaties to be negotiated by the executive and then submitted to Parliament for ratification. I am sure he will recall the peace treaty that President Woodrow Wilson signed, which the United States Senate refused to ratify. I am asking the senator whether he thinks Canada, on its own, should change the practice?

Senator Grosart: That is a very interesting question, and goes very much to the heart of the suggestions I am making.

First of all, to clear up the question of ratification, in Canada, there is no requirement of ratification by Parliament. However, in some countries there is that requirement. Ratification in the United States and in many other countries is by Parliament, or one house of Parliament in some cases. So, that is really not the situation here.

This particular problem arises only in those countries which are still under what we call the Westminster tradition, where this concept of the prerogative of the Crown has carried on. That is one of many prerogatives of the Crown. The modern tendency, of course, has been to whittle them away. There are few left now, but this, however, is one. It is the "odd man out" if you like. It is a special case for Canada and countries still under the Westminster tradition.

It is true that the method of giving final approval to such undertakings varies around the world. Speaking from memory, I think I am correct when I say that in most countries—certainly most countries in the Western World, other than those operating under the Westminster tradition—the right of Parliament to have information, and to approve, is greater than it is in a country such as Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

STATUTE LAW (METRIC CONVERSION) AMENDMENT BILL, 1978

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

[Senator Grosart.]

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Goldenberg, for the second reading of the Bill S-10, intituled: "An Act to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement".—(Honourable Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche)).

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, since Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche) is unable to be present today, I would be pleased, on his behalf, to yield to Senator Forsey, who I understand is prepared to speak at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I shall be very brief. I rise to sing a threnody or a dirge for the passing of the system of weights and measures to which we have been accustomed most of our lives. It is a matter of lasting grief to me that when this thing was first brought up it slipped past me unnoticed. The result of its passing, regardless of whether I noticed it or not, is that my declining years are being embittered by a constant series of exercises in mental arithmetic.

If honourable senators have noticed signs that I am doddering in my remarks in this chamber, I can assure them that I think the main cause of it is that my intelligence is being corroded, my wits are being addled, by the constant and strenuous exercise in mental arithmetic to which I am subjected by this infernal change to the metric system.

I realize that I am speaking against progress, I am speaking against the Zeitgeist, as the Germans call it, but I do want to register my expiring wail on this subject. I am going to read into the record of the Senate some verses which I wrote on this subject which I think may at least entertain honourable senators if they do nothing else. The verses are as follows:

LAMENT FOR THE OLD WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

The foreigners have taken over!
They've leapt across the Straits of Dover
And robbed us of our simple pleasures,
Our good old English weights and measures.
Henceforth, alas! to us it's barred
To buy or sell goods "by the yard".
No, no! It must be "by the metre",
And drinks are poured out by the litre.
An icy stare the chappie courts
Who asks for his in pints or quarts.
Butter in kilos now we're bound
To purchase; no more by the pound.
The wheat that's needed by our bakers
No longer comes from good broad acres.
In centigrade degrees we're told
Whether it's hot, or mild or cold;
And snow no longer falls by inches:
A thought at which the skier flinches.

No flight of miles our drivers heed:
 The kilometer limits speed.
 The only counting left that's ours
 Is years and months, weeks, days and hours.
 As in old times, these still are reckoned
 By minute, and un-metric second.
 For this small mercy let's be thankful,
 As all else daily gets more crankful.

I don't know how long it will be before we shall be invited to change over to some kind of metricated, metrified, petrified time system by which we shall have 10 months in a year, 10 days in a week, and I don't know quite what. I trust that I shall be gathered to my fathers before that final indignity is imposed upon us.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might direct a question to Senator Forsey. I am wondering whether that excellent piece of poetry was based upon inspiration from the rhymes of Robbie Burns.

Senator Forsey: As one with almost no Scottish blood whatever, I am afraid I cannot acknowledge any debt to Robbie Burns. I think my debt perhaps is rather to Lewis Carroll and Gilbert and Sullivan.

Senator Grosart: Or Robert Service.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Flynn: Certainly it cannot end on that note.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX ACT FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Barrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rizzuto, for the second reading of the Bill C-10, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Senator Bird: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might have leave to speak to this item at this time.

Senator Flynn: A request such as that coming from Senator Bird can hardly be refused. I would point out, however, that the debate was adjourned last evening on the understanding that the subject matter of the bill would be referred to committee and that we would hear the minister before the debate on the motion for second reading is concluded. We now know that the minister will be available tomorrow, and following that meeting there will no doubt be a report from the committee.

If Senator Bird wishes to speak at this time, we can hardly resist that request. But I want to point out that there is something rather irregular here, and I am certainly not referring to the speech that we are about to hear from her.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, I want to thank the Leader of the Opposition for allowing me to speak on this measure this afternoon. I can only hope that what I have to say will help the committee in its questioning.

Bill C-10, while not a perfect bill, is a sensible and innovative effort to act in accordance with three important traditional liberal principles. First, there is the principle of universality, which is a cornerstone in our firmly established system of social security. It does that by providing a taxable family allowance of $20 a month for every child in every Canadian family.

Secondly, there is the principle that the nation's wealth be redistributed, and this measure does that by providing a refundable tax credit of $200 a year for every child in families in which the combined net earnings of husband and wife amount to $18,000 or less a year. If the combined earnings of the spouses exceed $18,000 a year, the allowance is decreased by 5 per cent, until it is cut off at the point when the joint income reaches $26,000 a year. This means that the rich and the middle income people in our society will help to pay for a refundable tax credit that may enable children in 600,000 poor families to have a better start in life.

Thirdly, this bill accepts the principle that for certain types of social service it has become necessary to apply a means test. This principle has already been accepted, since the guaranteed income supplement is paid to people over the age of 65 who are living in extreme poverty, in spite of the help provided by the universal old age pension.

Bill C-10 is innovative because it uses the negative income tax method. This is an enlightened way of applying a means test, whereby it is made possible for the people who need help to receive it without suffering from a sense of shame or feeling stigmatized, as many do now who must apply for public assistance.

Some day I hope that further application of the negative income tax method may enable us to do away with the multiplicity of services by which we attempt to cope with the problems of poor and deprived people—and, honourable senators, the poor, alas, are still with us.

The government has been giving serious thought to this matter for over two years. One of its feasibility studies, entitled, "Integration of Social Program Payments into the Income Tax System," has been included in the budget papers. It outlines the administrative and technical difficulties involved. As it points out, it may be difficult to introduce this future reform, which was recommended nearly a decade ago by the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, and by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. It may indeed be difficult, but I refuse to believe that it is impossible.

I read a story as a child that I have never forgotten. I think I can still quote it almost verbatim:

Un jour, Napoléon Bonaparte donna à un jeune officier un ordre très difficile à exécuter.

"Monsieur," répondit l'officier, "cet ordre est impossible."

"Impossible," cria Napoléon, "ce mot n'est pas français".

● (1500)

Well, as a result of that early childhood experience, the word "impossible," whether in English or French, is not in my vocabulary when it is a question of getting things done. If we have the technical ability to put a satellite into orbit we can surely improve our present method of providing public assistance to the many disadvantaged people in our society.

This bill has the advantage of giving where the need is greatest without forcing the Treasury to dip into its pocket at a time when stringent economy is so necessary. There is no extra cost involved in this redistribution of funds. The same amount is in the kitty, but it will be spent differently by reducing the universal family allowance from $25.68 to $20 in order to pay the annual lump sum to families in the lower income brackets.

The bill has been criticized because it seems to discriminate unduly against the rich and the middle-income group by cancelling the chief breadwinner's $50 a year tax credit for each child. I'm sorry but that argument does not bring a tear to my eye. The bill is, after all, based on the principle of the redistribution of wealth.

In the past it was the poor who were discriminated against in the Income Tax Act. They did not pay any income tax and so received no relief either from the $50 a year tax credit, or from the tax exemptions for children which will continue to benefit those people who pay income tax.

I think that in one respect the bill could be improved by amendment. The $200 a year will be paid to families where the joint income of a husband and wife are below the stated level. If the man and woman in the family are not married, there is no cut-off level. In other words, this bill makes it financially more desirable for a couple with a joint income in a middle or higher bracket to live outside of wedlock rather than to be married.

In doing that, since married couples are penalized, Bill C-10 may contravene the Human Rights Act, which forbids discrimination on the grounds of marital status. The matter has been drawn to the attention of the Minister of Finance by Mr. Gordon Fairweather, the Commissioner of Human Rights.

I suggest that the members of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee might consider sending a message to the government suggesting that the bill be amended to recognize a common-law relationship—the way the Old Age Security Act, the Canada Pension Plan, and the Veterans Pension Plan have already been amended. In those acts the word "spouse" as well as applying to husband and wife, includes two persons of the opposite sex who have been living together for three or more years when there is a bar to their marriage, or at least one year when there is no bar.

If this change were made it would do away with discrimination against married couples and perhaps even save money, since a couple living in common-law relationship would not receive the annual tax credit when their joint income was over the cut-off amount.

Concern has been expressed in the other place and in the media because up until now only six of the premiers of the provinces have undertaken to recommend to their cabinets that there will be no reduction in the public assistance payments to families who receive the $200 refundable tax credit. The Honourable Monique Bégin has made personal visits and bombarded the premiers with telegrams, telex messages and telephone calls. But only six have agreed.

The federal government has, of course, no power to force them to do this. We must therefore rely on the force of public opinion to persuade all levels of government to act with justice and compassion, as well as with a mature understanding of what is the best and wisest policy for the good of society as a whole.

It has been argued that it is a form of discrimination against a husband to pay the tax credit to a mother, unless someone else is the legal guardian of the child. This is an example of the difficulty in drafting fair legislation. However, it makes sense to give it to the mother because women are, as a rule, the people who are responsible for the practical needs of children, for the buying of the clothing or other necessities that contribute to the well-being of the family. This principle was, as many of you will remember well, established once and for all when family allowances were first introduced.

At that time the Honourable Thérèse Casgrain played the role of a twentieth century Jeanne d'Arc, fighting for the rights of women. In her memoirs, Une Femme Chez Les Hommes, she tells how in the spring of 1944 when, at a meeting in Ottawa, George Davidson, the Deputy Minister of National Health and Welfare, whispered to her, "Madame, il se prépare quelque chose de très grave contre les femmes de votre province." She went on to say, "Il ne voulut rien ajouter."

She suspected that this serious matter had to do with family allowances, so immediately she arranged a rendezvous with Louis St. Laurent, then Minister of Justice, who confirmed her worst suspicions. Family allowances were to be paid to mothers in every province except Quebec. In Quebec they were to go to the fathers because at that time, according to the Civil Code, married women were considered to be minors in the eyes of the law. Fortunately, now the Civil Code has been amended.

Madam Casgrain wrote, "Cette réponse me choqua profondément," and characteristically she decided to do something about it. She went back to Montreal and, with the aid of three dauntless Québécoises, launched a furious publicity campaign against this outrageous decision. The Quebec unions supported her, as did the women.

A few days later MacKenzie King telephoned her and told her that the allowance would be paid to Quebec mothers. The first pay cheques were three weeks late in arriving because all of the original cheques had to be destroyed and new ones printed.

That year I was told by the Honourable Brooke Claxton, Minister of National Health and Welfare, who introduced family allowances, that the entire cabinet was hiding in cupboards and crawling under the beds in fear and trembling lest Madam Casgrain descended on Ottawa like an avenging angel.

Today I am sure all MPs and senators would be hiding in cupboards or crawling under the beds if any government suggested not paying the $200 a year to mothers. The consequences would be too awful to contemplate. I have visions of Laura Sabia leading millions of women to Parliament Hill. I can see them trampling the tulip beds and rushing into the other place and even invading this sacred chamber where we sit today. Of course, Thérèse Casgrain would be there again, and I have a feeling that I would be up there in the vanguard, egging them on, or acting as a fifth column or something.

Honourable senators, this bill is not perfect—I am not sure there is such a thing as perfect legislation—but it is an enlightened bill. It has compassion, a heart, because it may help two million deprived children to have a better chance in life. I need not remind you that Canada's children are the nation's hope for tomorrow.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I am not in the mood to make a speech today. After hearing the speech by the honourable senator who introduced the bill yesterday, I was much distressed. I do not blame him at all, but the memorandum prepared by the department mentioned that Marsh, a social scientist from British Columbia, had made a contribution to the family allowance question, and that the Right Honourable W. L. MacKenzie King had made a contribution. It never occurred to the department to indicate in the memorandum that the contribution of value in respect of this particular bill came from the Senate, and that the principle underlying the bill—MacKenzie King never heard of it, Marsh never heard of it, and they would not recognize it if they were around—is a simple one but a very important one and a very far-reaching one, and it is new. It merely proclaims that the tax system, which up to now has benefited those who pay income tax, will heretofore benefit those who do not pay income tax. It is as simple as that, and, as I said, it is new. It extends social benefits on a geared-to-income tax basis. It is a forward step. It is a leap, as a matter of fact. It is new, it is different and it is original.

I was very disappointed that no mention was made of this, but that is the kind of treatment we in the Senate often get. We are ignored as though we didn't exist, as though we didn't have any part in formulating the principle of this bill. The principle is vitally important. It is the first step towards the guaranteed income under a negative income tax system. Not at the moment, perhaps, but the method will be used for the purpose of doing away with the welfare system as we now know it. If it does, we will bless it. It is not a very thunderous forward step, but it is something that we can well be proud of.

How could the department, in drawing up the memorandum, forget that in 1972 the Senate made a report on poverty that was read in every social science class in every university? More than 30,000 people bought a copy. It has been endorsed by every sort of group in this country. I don't for a moment suggest that we invented the guaranteed annual income, but we got it off the ground as a social and political movement; we made the idea respectable, practical and acceptable, and we have been at it for years.

As a matter of fact, those who know something of the history will remember that when the Honourable Marc Lalonde was the minister he did his best to get it put into effect. The history of the guaranteed annual income is that Mr. Lalonde wanted the government to proclaim it some years ago, but John Turner objected and there was a great deal of reaction between them, until the Prime Minister said, "Yes, we will accept it, but we will put it into effect when we are able to do so."

Before I go any further, I should like to say that one of my purposes in rising is to put on record a table of the updated poverty line. I have sent a copy of this to every member of the Senate. I ask permission to have this table printed at this point in my speech.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SENATE REPORT: Poverty level set at approximately 50% of average Canadian family income adjusted to family size, making provision for inflation and gross national product.

STATISTICS CANADA: Lines are based on changing consumption patterns which now indicate that families who spend 62% or more of their income on food, clothing and shelter (as opposed to the 70% criterion used at an earlier date) are in straitened circumstances. These limits are also differentiated by size of area of residence. For example, the poverty line for a family of 4 in 1977 ranges from $7,110 in a rural area to $9,778 in cities of ½ million or more people.

Senator Croll: The guaranteed annual income had been endorsed by all religious denominations, by labour, social organizations and universities. Yet, as I pointed out, the memorandum to which I referred neglected to mention our contribution, and I think it is time that we in the Senate stood up and said what we have to say and indicated that we, too, are making a contribution.

I support the tax credit, as I am sure all honourable senators do. However, I do not agree with the cut in the family allowances, and if clause 10 of the bill is dealt with by itself I shall certainly vote against it. I do not think there is any justification for interfering with the benefits. While on that point, I should like to indicate that income distribution has not made progress in this country. I will come to that later.

Honourable senators, I have here a table, the source of which is Statistics Canada, showing the income distribution for families and unattached individuals in each of five quintiles from the lowest to the highest. I ask permission to put that on record, too. I am sure it will be useful to honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

A quintile is a fifth of the population.

* Earnings are for the year 1977.

Senator Croll: I do not accept the reduction in family allowances, although I know it is generally accepted because in the end some families will benefit from it. Much more serious than that is the fact that there is in the air in the country today a suggestion that there be a reduction in social benefits. The Economic Council of Canada has made such a suggestion in two reports. In one of the reports the council deplors the fact that labour people will not sit on the council; they have withdrawn and they won't go back. If I were a labour man asked to sit on the council I would refuse as well. They would be better off if they paid some attention to the Economic Council of Canada by picketing it from now on.

It is well to remember that there are some things in this country that are just untouchable. We have a social service system and a basic old age system by which people live. Let me indicate to you what something that has come to us over many years consists of:

1. An old age security pension of $1,841 in 1978;
2. An income tested supplement with maximum benefit of $1,291 for single persons and $1,147 for each married individual, hence $2,294 per couple, in 1978;
3. A public pension scheme, Canada Pension Plan, with an average annual retirement benefit in 1977 of $1,027; and
4. A set of tax reductions consisting of (a) the age exemption of $1,520 in 1978; (b) the pension income deduction up to a maximum of $1,000 in 1978; and (c) dividend and interest income deducted up to a maximum of $1,000 in 1978.

These are all parts of the system which it has taken us many years to build.

As I indicated, the Economic Council has on two occasions attacked the universality of our old age security system. We must keep in mind that universal programs provide greater dignity to beneficiaries and increase self-determination on the part of the poor by treating them like everyone else in society. It places less emphasis on class distinctions and more on our common humanity. To the poor, it offers more hope to better themselves through their own efforts and sacrifices. Finally, universal programs are fairer than welfare programs.

I am not dealing with the details of the bill, but when the Economic Council begins to speak of Canada wanting more social programs than it can afford, I do not know that it is the best judge of what Canada can afford. We who were here before yesterday have heard that time and time again, and invariably they have been wrong.

I spoke of the distinction in income among the various members of our society. Originally, we started out to see what we could do for the working poor. If you remember the report, it spoke of having three-quarters of a million people in various parts of Canada who could receive more money on welfare than they were receiving for work. Something had to be done for them. At one time, Mr. Lalonde, when he was minister, attempted to bring the provinces together for the purpose of paying a subsidy. I think it was $90. He got agreement from them all except Ontario. They would not go along with it. There was nothing further he could do.

This will help the situation. The strange part about it is that we have been saying to ourselves that we could not do anything at all about the guaranteed annual income until such time as conditions change and we were out of those difficult times; that we did not have the money and we could not do anything about it. Everybody believed it. Yet, under the stress of the need to do something, here we are doing it when we are almost at our lowest; when we face high unemployment and other difficulties. We do it now, thus proving that everything those people were saying was wrong all the time.

An Hon. Senator: There is an election coming up.

Senator Croll: Let me tell you something. If they did that for me, I would be very much impressed and, as a matter of fact, I would vote for them. I do not care what the reason is, this is a good measure and a good principle.

What we have left out now becomes very important. We have not done anything for that group of people between 60 and 65 years of age, wherein there is a real need. In that group there are about 300,000 women and about 200,000 men, who all need help and for whom nothing at all has been provided. Something should be done for them.

An Hon. Senator: Voters!

Senator Croll: It is very difficult for us to say we will pay the old age pension at age 60. It is very costly. Yet, a great deal must be done for those people. They cannot sit for the next five years or longer waiting for something to be done. We have now indicated that, despite our financial difficulties, we want to do something for these people to give them some hope.

I do not want the country to forget—I am not going to let it forget, and you ought not to let it forget either—that the Senate made a great contribution. We were the people who studied this problem. We are the people who made a recommendation, and stuck our necks out six or seven years ago and said that this is a good thing to do. We are the people who brought public opinion around to the point where the government is doing it now—doing it in a small way, but doing it.

When people start abusing the Senate—and that comes easily to most people—at least we have an opportunity to stand up and say, “Yes, but here is a new, novel and important idea in the face of politics, indicating that it is the art of the possible, and we brought it into the open and it has been adopted.” Perhaps some people will get the impression that we do have a purpose, and that we exercise that purpose.

I am sure before social measures progress further, and as the negative income tax continues to be introduced for the aged, for those widows, for those widowers and for those unfortunate people, that the country will come to the conclusion that the Senate is very important to its interest, and those who attack the Senate from time to time will have to justify it.

This is not the only thing we have done, but one thing that we have done is study matters and make recommendations which, in the main, have been accepted. All we ask from the members of the other house is that they say that some of the things we have done are worthy, and they are glad we have done them because they did not have the time.

This method of approaching welfare is vital to the country at the present time. I rise for the purpose of indicating that we in the Senate should look with pride upon this present accomplishment. It is one of our many accomplishments in recent times.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY PROBLEMS OF INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION IN THE MARKETING OF GRAINS

On the Order:

Resuming debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Argue, seconded by the Honourable Senator McNamara:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture be authorized to examine and report upon the problems of international co-operation in the marketing of grains and other agricultural products; and

That the committee, or any subcommittee so authorized by the committee, may adjourn from place to place for the purpose of such examination. (Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: I yield to Senator Argue.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I ask that the last paragraph of the motion be modified to read as follows:

That the committee, or any subcommittee so authorized by the committee, may adjourn from place to place in Canada or to Washington, D.C., U.S.A. for the purpose of such examination.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Grosart: I rise to respond to the motion to give leave. It is a motion, and we sometimes forget that. It is a motion to suspend the rules of the Senate.

I merely wish to ask the senator why this modification is regarded as being necessary, because the motion now reads, "from place to place." Perhaps there is a restriction there.

Senator Argue: In response to Senator Grosart's question, I am glad to say that our committee has been invited to meet with United States senators from time to time. We have received an invitation to set up a joint task force to continue to study the whole idea of international co-operation in the marketing of wheat. This invitation is before the Senate committee, and to respond to it we need this kind of authority.

Senator Grosart: I am not questioning the necessity of accepting this invitation, but rather the necessity of altering the motion which now reads "may adjourn from place to place." I am wondering whether this is regarded as being restrictive, because we often use these words. I would be interested in knowing if this wording would restrict the committee to adjourning from place to place in Canada?

Senator Argue: The original motion before you reads "from place to place." That is pretty broad. This modification would prevent the Agriculture Committee from undertaking a world tour, which we do not have in mind in this case. We do have in mind a possible return to Washington, D.C. That is the reason for the modified wording.

Motion, as modified, agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE

WEDNESDAY, December 6, 1978

The Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline has the honour to present its First Report as follows:

The Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline was first appointed on May 24, 1978, during the last session of Parliament.

On October 12, 1978, after the commencement of the present session, the Senate adopted the following motion:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed

(1) to inquire into any matter relating to the planning and construction of the pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada described in An Act to establish the Northern Pipeline Agency, to facilitate the planning and construction of a pipeline for the transmission of natural gas from Alaska and Northern Canada and to give effect to an Agreement between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to such a pipeline and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, Chapter 20, Statutes of Canada, 1977-78,

(2) to consider, in particular, all reports, orders, agreements, regulations, directions, recommendations and approvals referred to in the said Act, and

(3) to report to the Senate thereon at least once in each session of Parliament during the period of the planning and construction of the pipeline;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee and to adjourn from place to place in Canada; and

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the Committee.

The present committee was appointed on October 25, 1978.

The Northern Pipeline Act provides the legislative framework for the planning and construction of the Northern Pipeline and gives effect to the Canada-U.S. Agreement. It grants to the designated companies the right to build the pipeline and it creates the Northern Pipeline Agency to carry out the federal responsibilities in relation to the pipeline.

Your committee in fulfilling its mandate has been actively engaged in monitoring the pipeline related activities of the Agency and of the pipeline companies involved.

The committee appointed in the last session has held eight meetings and heard four witnesses from the Agency and the Foothills group.

The present committee has held seven meetings to date and has heard nine witnesses from the Agency and the Foothills group.

During these meetings, the committee discussed the progress of the pipeline, including subjects such as the financing of the project, the federal-provincial consultative process involved, the environmental and socio-economic conditions and the procedure for acquiring the rights-of-way necessary for the construction of the line. This latter issue has become a major emphasis of the committee. Concern has been expressed about the methods of acquiring the land rights for the pipeline and the fairness of the procedure towards the landowners who would be affected.

To evaluate the adequacy of these procedures, the committee gathered information on the land acquisition procedures under federal jurisdiction, as well as on those applicable under provincial law. The information obtained indicated that there is a substantial difference between federal methods of acquisition of pipeline rights-of-way, and provincial methods with which, from past experience, the landowners were generally more familiar. Thus, the committee felt the need to inform the landowners of their rights under the federal law, in addition to providing them with information that would increase their general understanding of the pipeline. The committee accordingly issued two Bulletins dealing with these matters and sent them to the prospective landowners along the route of the pipeline where the names and addresses have been supplied by Foothills.

The responses received to date from various prospective landowners in Alberta have confirmed the committee's fears. The landowners are concerned and confused about the methods to be used to acquire the land rights required for the Northern Pipeline.

The committee, after its study, has come to the conclusion that the federal procedures are inadequate and place the landowner in an untenable position. Pursuant to the National Energy Board Act, the acquisition of the land rights is done simply by negotiation between the company and the landowner. It does not involve either the National Energy Board or the Northern Pipeline Agency. If agreement is not reached, the National Energy Board Act refers to the expropriation procedures contained in the Railway Act as applicable. These expropriation procedures are antiquated. Consequently the committee intends to prepare amendments to existing legislation in order to enact an improved acquisition procedure.

The committee is also becoming increasingly aware of the need to view this pipeline in the context of the overall gas supply and demand requirements. The National Energy Board is presently conducting hearings that will determine whether Canada has any gas available for export. The pre-building of the southern portion of the Alaska Highway Pipeline Project depends on a favourable determination in this regard. An application by Pan Alberta now before the National Energy Board is seeking approval for the export of 1.04 billion cubic feet of natural gas daily. In its monitoring function, the committee will be following closely the National Energy Board gas supply/demand hearing and decision, which will govern not only the pre-building of the southern portion of the Alaska Highway Pipeline Project but also a number of other major projects important to Canada's energy future, such as the Polar Gas Project and the extension of gas service to eastern Quebec and the Maritimes.

An efficient way to accomplish this task would be to refer the estimates of appropriate federal Departments and agencies such as the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the National Energy Board to the committee on a regular basis.

Respectfully submitted,

H. A. (BUD) OLSON,
Chairman

NATIONAL DEFENCE

THE NEW FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Speaker: I am pleased to announce that based on conclusions of one of the most thorough evaluations of a defence procurement program ever carried out in this country, cabinet has now approved a set of directions regarding the next stage of the process towards acquisition of a new fighter aircraft (NFA) for the Canadian Forces.

In arriving at these conclusions I have been guided by, and the judgements reflect, the military advice which I have received from the Chief of the Defence Staff. The government, through the offices of the NFA Program Manager, has now informed four of the competing manufacturers that their aircraft are no longer in the competition. These are: Grumman with the F-14 Tomcat; McDonnell-Douglas with the F-15 Eagle; Panavia with the Tornado and Northrop with the F-18L Cobra.

The finalists will be the General Dynamics CF-16 and the McDonnell-Douglas/Northrop CF-18A which are the Canadian versions of these aircraft. The government has also decided against further consideration of a mixed fleet of fighters. The governments of the Federal Republic of Germany, Great Britain, Italy and the United States which all have been following this selection process with keen interest, are also being informed of this development.

Direction has now been given to the interdepartmental program office to initiate discussions leading to the negotiation of draft contracts with the two prime manufacturers remaining in competition. In addition to the very important questions of aircraft capability, fleet size, delivery schedule and optimum phasing of payments, emphasis will be placed on negotiating the best mix of industrial benefits for Canada. In these negotiations particular attention will be paid to arrangements that could contribute to the growth of research and development activity in Canada as well as high technology industry which complements our geography and resources. Emphasis also will be given to ensuring that all regions of the country will have full opportunity to participate in this program.

I expect that it will be several months before I am in a position to present a comparative analysis of draft contracts to cabinet for final selection of a new fighter aircraft.

I am sure that those of you who have followed the evolution of the program since its start, in March 1977, have come to realize the magnitude of the task facing the government in this selection process.

At the end of June, as you will recall, the government decided to allow additional time to permit manufacturers to refine their initial proposals. I am pleased to report that by the new deadline of August 1st all had responded with offers that contained substantial improvements over their earlier proposals.

Our numerical requirement of between 130 and 150 aircraft is critical to our capability to meet our domestic and European commitments. We are indeed disappointed that procurement of sufficient numbers of F-14's, F-15's or Tornados could not be accommodated within our set budget of $2.34 billion (August 1977 dollars).

Our evaluation also revealed that acquisition of a mixed fleet would bring little or no benefit in terms of fleet size and that operation of such a fleet would bring substantial liabilities including double training and logistics support systems over the life span of the aircraft.

The two most severe constraints that we face and will continue to face are the number of aircraft required and the set amount of money to buy them. Our task, then, is to buy the best military aircraft available within those constraints, while seeking the best possible industrial benefits with a minimum of project risk.

In addition to cost and numbers, there are other considerations that serve to favour the two aircraft we have kept in the process. To begin with, there is the military and political assessment that we have made of the current—and to a certain extent, anticipated—strategic situation that we are facing.

We have come to the conclusion that an adequate number of the smaller aircraft equipped with radar guided air-to-air missiles and suitably deployed across Canada, could afford us the capability to fully exercise our sovereignty by intercepting, identifying, and if necessary, destroying aircraft that might be probing into Canadian airspace. Having this type of prudent capability, we believe, would deter probes and offer adequate protection against the possibility of a bomber attack on the North American continent.

Having eliminated the three most expensive systems from the competition, three remained—the CF-16, the CF-18A and the CF-18L—that met or came very close to meeting our numerical requirements within the budgetary envelope while being able to meet the most likely military challenges.

The CF-18L proposed by Northrop could meet these most likely challenges and probably be acquired in sufficient quantities. Potentially, it also provides a very attractive package of industrial benefits. However, we have assessed as very considerable the risk of committing Canada to buying a sophisticated aircraft that is not in service with any other country. At this time, I consider all the various types of risks which could be involved in the development and initial introduction into operational service of this aircraft are greater than we either need or are prepared to accept. Moreover, even in the best of circumstances, the delivery schedule of the CF-18L is likely to be markedly behind that required for the timely replacement of our CF-101 and CF-104 aircraft.

The F-16 is a single-engine aircraft which has been selected by five of our NATO allies including the United States. Should the CF-16 be acquired, Canada would of course have extensive commonality with NATO allies in Europe. While this aircraft does not have the degree of sophistication of the larger aircraft, it does have acceptable capability and is the only aircraft which at this point meets the numbers required.

The other fighter remaining in the competition, the CF-18A, offers us another set of possibilities. It may be more expensive than the CF-16 would be, therefore we can expect to acquire fewer although I am optimistic that an adequate number to meet our roles can be acquired in negotiations. Purchase of this aircraft could allow for co-operative logistics arrangements with the United States.

On the other hand, being a twin-engined, somewhat larger aircraft, the CF-18A offers some definite advantages of its own. These include a good potential for growth, or a capability to be fitted with new systems that may be necessary to cater to future demands made of a fighter aircraft. The CF-18A also currently has more advanced all-weather capabilities in the context of sovereignty protection and air defence.

We must recognize, however, that in both military and political terms, a major consideration for Canada is collective security in Europe. This is where the philosophy—or strategy—of deterrence, common to all members of the NATO alliance, is subject to its greatest challenge, in the light of qualitative and quantitative improvements to the forces of the Warsaw Pact countries.

It is important that our own contributions to collective security be quantitatively and qualitatively adequate for deterrence. Quantitatively, this means a number of aircraft at least equal to that we now commit to the Alliance in Central Europe and to the Northern Flank. This total number of aircraft, plus some for training and attrition, makes up well over half of our total requirement. This is clearly a factor that influences the type of capability that we must seek in the fleet—the qualitative aspect of the contribution. We want that capability to be prudently adequate for the sovereignty and air defence roles in Canada and also to be effective in particular roles in central Europe and in northern Norway.

As you can appreciate, there are pros and cons to both types of aircraft. I can assure you that there were also some pros and cons to all aircraft that have now been eliminated. Our request for proposal provided a standard which enabled us to obtain truly comparable data for all contenders. No single aircraft could possibly have met all specifications given in the request for proposal. Nor was it the Government's intention to acquire an aircraft whose capabilities far exceeded those required to adequately carry out assessed roles.

We are convinced that we have now made a very judicious decision in selecting these two aircraft for further consideration, taking into account the factors of military requirements, budgetary considerations, the minimum number of aircraft required, the risk element and the potential industrial benefits.

We expect that a reduction to two contenders will have a very favourable impact on Canadian industry's ability to participate with prime manufacturers in the development of detailed industrial proposals.

To the prime manufacturers who have devoted considerable resources to this competition so far, and particularly to manufacturers' representatives who have displayed so much energy and sincere efforts in presenting their companies' proposals in the best possible light, we owe thanks for their exceptional co-operation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I am confident that in this next critical phase of the fighter program, the interdepartmental team and all others who are in any way involved will continue to work in an atmosphere of fair and keen competition, and that rapid progress will be made towards selection of a new fighter aircraft to meet Canada's needs to the end of the century.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA

APPOINTMENT OF EDWARD RICHARD SCHREYER—ANNOUNCEMENT

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a press release from the office of the Prime Minister which I am very pleased to read to the honourable senators:

The Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, announced today that, on his recommendation, The Queen has been pleased to approve the appointment of Edward Richard Schreyer as Governor General of Canada in succession to the Right Honourable Jules Léger, C.C., C.M.M., C.D. Mr. Schreyer will assume office in late January 1979.

I know that all of us wish the Governor General designate the very best during his forthcoming term of service to the Canadian people. Our good wishes go, as well, to his wife and his family on this significant occasion.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I believe it behooves me to say a few words about the news the Leader of the Government has just acquainted us with. I note that he received the press release from the Prime Minister's office. I trust he did not first hear of the news through that press release.

In any event, I should like to say to the Governor General designate that we are happy to see him accede to this very important office. He represents the ethnic group. I say "ethnic" in the sense of the third language group in Canada. He speaks both official languages, English and French. Moreover, I understand he speaks other languages as well, which will assist him in the performance of his duties.

The prospect of having a 43-year old Governor General become, in five years from now, a former Governor General at 48 years of age, astonishes me somewhat, I must say.

Still, I am particularly happy at the thought that the first major duty he will probably have to perform will be that of calling upon the leader of the Conservative Party to form a new government.

Be that as it may, I extend to him, his wife and family, our very best wishes and, naturally, the assurance of our wholehearted cooperation.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, December 11, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like, as has become the practice, to make a brief statement about Senate business for the coming week. The plan is for the house to sit on Monday evening and on Tuesday evening, leaving all day Tuesday free for committees.

The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will continue with its examination of the subject matter of Bill C-15, Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1978, at 9.30 a.m. on Tuesday. Two Senate committees have also arranged meetings for Tuesday afternoon. The Special Committee of the Senate on Retirement Age Policies will sit at 2 p.m., and the Health, Welfare and Science Committee will hear witnesses with respect to the subject matter of Bill C-14, Unemployment Insurance, at 4 p.m.

On Wednesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-15; the Agriculture Committee will meet when the Senate rises; and the Health, Welfare and Science Committee will continue with its examination of the subject matter of Bill C-14 at 3 p.m. or when the Senate rises.

On Thursday the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies will meet at 9 a.m.; the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet on the subject matter of Bill C-15 at 9.30 a.m.; the Transport and Communications Committee will meet on Bill S-6, Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979, at 10 a.m.; and the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 11 a.m. On Thursday afternoon at 4.00, or when the Senate rises, the Health, Welfare and Science Committee will meet again on the subject matter of Bill C-14.

● (1410)

In the Senate we shall deal with the amendments to Bill S-9, Bill C-10, and other items on the order paper. In addition, we shall have the supply bill covering supplementary estimates (A), which is to pass tonight in the other place. Also next week we can expect to receive Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, and hopefully Bill C-14.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I was under the impression that the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution was to meet on Tuesday morning. Senator Langlois did not mention that.

Senator Langlois: I have received no information to that effect. I am told it is very unlikely that this committee will be sitting on that day.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Flynn: We could put the question to the chairman.

Senator Lang: We are now into the pre-Christmas rush and we have two weeks of sittings ahead of us. Is there any possibility that we could persuade the chairmen of committees not dealing specifically with legislation to hold off their sittings until after our adjournment? It is going to press us all very hard to deal with our legislative program, which must take first priority.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, the decision had been made that the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution would not meet on Tuesday. However, because of recent developments, the steering committee felt that it should schedule a meeting, and therefore one has been called.

Senator Flynn: For what time?

Senator Stanbury: For 10.30 Tuesday morning.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SALE OF LABRADOR LINERBOARD MILL LTD.—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in recent days Senator Marshall, who is temporarily absent from his place here today, has been pressing the issue of the Labrador Linerboard Mill.

I can report that a formal proposal from the Province of Newfoundland dealing with the conversion and the reactivation of the Labrador Linerboard Mill of Stephenville, Newfoundland, was recently received by the Honourable Marcel Lessard, federal Minister of Regional and Economic Expansion.

Both Mr. Lessard and the Honourable W. Doody, Provincial Minister for Intergovernmental Affairs, discussed this subject on November 29, 1978.

The Newfoundland proposal, which seeks federal government assistance, is presently being assessed. It is hoped that a decision on this matter will be forthcoming in the near future.

INCOME TAX ACT FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Barrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rizzuto, for the second reading of the Bill C-10, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, in the absence of my friend from Newfoundland, I wonder if I might be allowed to say a word on this matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not expect to detain you long this afternoon because I have no objection to the main thrust of this bill, which is to increase the amount of assistance the family allowance represents to lower income groups at the expense of others in the community. In fact, that is a principle in which I find myself in complete accord.

It might be of interest to comment on some of the interesting features in this bill that might escape notice because it is such a densely worded and technical document.

The first, of course, is that we are enshrining in this bill a variety of the negative income tax principle. As the bill indicates, some $200 per child will be available as a tax credit for those who pay taxes on an annual basis or, in the case of those who pay no income tax, the amount will be made over to them, which, in effect, is a form of negative income tax. It is worth noting that this is perhaps the first time—it is certainly the first time that I am aware of—that this principle has been included in any legislation in Canada. I think it highlights the fact that we need to know a lot more about the real impact and the real problems and advantages associated with negative income tax. Speaking for myself, at least, I feel I need to know a lot more about this, because it is likely we shall see more of this kind of legislation in the future, and it would be well to be informed. I hope that someone in the Senate will undertake to study this matter.

The second thing I call attention to is the fact that the bill provides for a lumping of income as between man and wife in deciding certain details that are called for under the bill. This is certainly an unusual feature in Canadian tax law, but perhaps not unique. Here, too, is another alteration in principle which perhaps deserves more attention than it gets in the brief summary that we have of this legislation.

An interesting fact is, of course, that as the bill stands it pays to be common-law, or it may pay to be common-law, because there is no provision whereby common-law spouses—if I can use that incorrect description—

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Consorts.

Senator Roblin: Consorts; a splendid word. Why didn't I think of that? There is no provision whereby common-law consorts can avoid the lumping together of their income in replying to the requests that the government makes to decide how much money they get. I don't know whether that is a form of violation of human rights, but it certainly makes for discrimination on the basis of marital status. That must be something that is causing some of our friends a little bit of a chuckle. I understand that the Human Rights Commissioner has taken up the matter. I am not sure whether he is serious or doing it in jest. However, it shows what happens when you get into tax laws of this kind.

Another result of this measure—and this is worthy of note—is that there will be a million and a half more people filling out forms. Senator Barrow, in moving second reading, expressed the matter very delicately, I thought, when he said that some one and a half million Canadian mothers will, for the first time, have some contact with the income tax system. When I first heard him I thought he was proposing that as an advantage of the bill, but upon further reflection I think possibly he was just advising us that the legion of form-fillers never ends; it continues to grow, and looks as though it will grow an awful lot more. Of course, there are certain costs connected with implementing that system, and they will probably amount to several hundred thousands of dollars.

The most significant feature to which I want to make a brief reference is that this bill represents a further retreat from the principle of universality in connection with social welfare measures. The family allowance system has up to now been universal in its character, although I have to admit that it has been modified by income tax to a considerable extent. In this bill we have a deliberate, well-considered move to modify, by the income tax system, the universal application of the family allowance program, and to move it closer to a needs related system and away from universal application. I must say that I applaud that idea. I think Senator Barrow expressed the matter very fairly and accurately when he said:

The system now in place needs to be altered so that the level of benefits more accurately reflects the needs of children. This means that we have to change the current system so that families who need it get more assistance than those who do not. This, I think, is an eminently sensible goal.

I heartily agree with that sentiment. Senator Barrow went on to give expression to another important reality in dealing with matters of social welfare:

However, we also face the reality that we are going through a difficult economic period. The government is seeking ways to cut overall government spending. Therefore, we do not have access to new resources with which to improve the current system. Instead, we must re-arrange the existing system so that it will be fairer and will better meet the needs of children. That is, we must do a better job with the resources already at our disposal.

● (1420)

Now, I commend that sentiment to the thoughtful consideration of this assembly, because it represents a distinct recognition of the need to make a move from the universal welfare system to a more needs related and specific welfare system. I think that has to be the shape of events to come.

Mind you, it is not much of a move, because further on in his statement my honourable friend Senator Barrow tells us that, taking the position in 1979, a two-child family domiciled in Ontario with a $5,000 annual income will in 1979 receive a total benefit of $880 from the child benefit system. A family similarly situated but with an income of $50,000 would receive $750. So on the one hand we have the family with $5,000 and less receiving $880 for two children, and on the other we have the family with $50,000 receiving $750 for the two children, a difference of only $130.

I should go on to say that in the case of the family with $50,000, there is a tax effect which I do not think has been worked into the figures I am quoting.

I want to express my opinion that the $50,000 family still gets too much, and the $5,000 family still gets too little. This illustrates in an exceedingly graphic and practical way one of the main shortcomings of the universal social welfare system with which this country has encumbered itself. We have to face the fact that the pool of public funds available to social welfare is limited. If we listen to the cries of the taxpayers across the country today, I think we can say that the prospect of any large amount of further transfer of payments of this nature on a universal basis is probably unlikely and that the amount available will certainly be limited. There is only so much available. There is only so much that society is willing to set apart to rectify the inequalities and the hardships of life as between those who are strong and able and those who require the help and support and the assistance of their neighbours and of their country.

It seems to me that if the sum is limited, it only makes the best of good sense to make sure that it gets to those who need it, and that is what the universal system, emphatically, never does. It does not see that the correct amount gets to those who need it. It does not see that the money goes where it will do the most good.

The sponsor of this bill, and the minister in committee, gave a nod in the direction of policy which I am indicating this afternoon. I thank them for it. My only regret is that I do not think they went far enough. I think they should go all the way. They should refrain from using the Income Tax Act for social welfare purposes. Its basic purpose is to raise revenue. The assistance that is so badly required by so many people of this country should be given by means of direct payments based on need.

We have a direct payments system in the family allowance plan right now. We have needs related systems in the guaranteed income supplement and others right now, some of which use the provincial distribution system to make sure they get it into the right hands.

But I come back to the main point. I say that a universal system will be too expensive, if we are to deal with the real needs of the people at the bottom end of the scale. I say that the money under the universal system does not go to those who need it. Furthermore, experience over the past years has indicated clearly enough that our efforts to redistribute income in this country have not been very successful.

There have been a number of studies that bear on this matter. While I would not care to subscribe to everything that is contained in the document I have in my hand, which is called, "In Search of Robin Hood," by W. Irwin Gillespie, nevertheless he says many things to which we should pay some heed.

I wish to read one paragraph from this document. I think it reinforces the point I am trying to make about the redistribution of income in this country.

[Senator Roblin.]

The empirical evidence demonstrates that the federal government has not improved the economic position of the poor relative to the highest income families during the 1970s. The social legislation of the early seventies failed to improve the relative economic position of the poorest families.

There is more to the same effect, but I will not burden the house with further detail. All I am saying is that in this situation logic has been confirmed by experience. If our welfare policies consist in giving the same to everyone, and I admit that that is a general statement which must be modified because not every program does that, but if we say that our welfare system is to give the same to everyone, it follows quite logically, to my mind at any rate, that if your goal is redistribution of income relatively between the various income groups of society, you will not make much headway. That is precisely what appears to have happened in this country in the last 20 years in spite of all our efforts.

If the needy, the old aged, the deserted mothers, the children, the crippled, and those who have less than a decent standard of life, all of whom have a large and justified claim on the charitable instincts of society, are to get what they need to have the kind of life we would like them to have, I suggest to the Senate that it will never be done on the universal principle. It will only be done if we are willing to grasp this nettle of taking these cases on the basis of need and making sure, after we have determined what their needs and resources are, that we know the difference that should be made up.

If we follow a plan of this kind, our money will go much farther and will be spent to much better effect, and such a plan will be less of a burden on society at large. It will be a real benefit, a bigger and better benefit, to the people who need; the people who do not need—and there are some in this chamber today who are beneficiaries of the universal system—will just have to make the sacrifice to ensure that we abandon universality and approach need. If volunteers are required, I am willing to offer myself as a candidate. I must put my money where my mouth is, and I am ready to do that. I would not be surprised if a good many others in this chamber are prepared to make the same statement.

Honourable senators, I will detain you no further. I intend to support this bill. I hope it leads to a further adjustment away from the universal principle, and more to the basis of need. It moves in that direction now. I hope it is a signal of what we may expect in future legislation from this government or the next respecting social welfare programs in Canada.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I am afraid I just cannot keep out of this debate. I had not intended to speak on second reading of this bill, but, in principle, I am in complete accord with the sentiments expressed by Senator Roblin. I wish to add just one other caveat. Using the Income Tax Act to redistribute the wealth of the country is, I think, a fundamental travesty. We have done this before. We attempted, in Bill C-58 of the first session of this Parliament, to use the Income Tax Act to serve cultural purposes. We have used it in other ways, but not to the extent that this bill uses it.

There are two basic reasons why I say it is inappropriate for this purposes. First, the Income Tax Act must remain an instrument of raising money for the exchequer. Second, if we introduce social policy in large measure, as this bill does, through the Income Tax Act, then those persons in our society who disagree with that policy become less honest in their self-assessment. I do not want to see a departure from the self-assessment form of taxation, but if we use the Income Tax Act as an instrument of social policy, we will weaken that principle of responsible self-assessment, which is fundamental to the income tax concept as a whole. Once we breach that confidence in the fairness and equity of the system, we break down our taxation base.

I can easily imagine that this same result could be accomplished through amendments to the Family Allowances Act. That would be the equitable and proper way to bring about this result. I agree with Senator Roblin. I think the principle of universality in this measure is ridiculous. The people who need the money must get the money, not those who do not need it.

This bill, in effect, is a charade. It does not really shift that amount of the national wealth to where it belongs. To try to do so through the Income Tax Act defeats the policy. To do the same thing through the Family Allowances Act would result in an honest piece of legislation, and no taxpayer would question the merits of the Income Tax Act in making his or her personal self assessment.

I am not going to vote against this bill but I am distressed to see how we are distorting certain fundamental concepts in our legislative process. It can be argued, of course, that the Income Tax Act is a convenient method of bringing about the policy objectives. That, to me, does not make any sense. Computer information can be transferred from the Department of National Revenue to the Department of National Health and Welfare in 30 seconds. There is no reason why the same result could not be brought about under the Family Allowances Act. Were it done through that statute, the policy would stand on its own. The public would then know what the objectives are and the amount of money being spent for that purpose.

Let us use the Income Tax Act for raising the necessary revenues of the country, but please let us not use it for policy objectives under the smokescreen of its being a more convenient vehicle. In my opinion, that simply does not make sense.

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Barrow speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Barrow: Honourable senators, I want, first of all, to thank Senator Bird, Senator Croll, Senator Roblin and Senator Lang for taking part in this debate. In particular, I want to refer to the fact that I omitted from my speech on Thursday last a reference to the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada. The chairman of that committee, Senator Croll, was very tactful in the manner in which he nearly, but not quite, absolved me of any blame for that error, and I thank him for that. I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare gives full credit to that committee and its excellent report in the formulation of the policy behind Bill C-10.

There have been some questions raised through the course of the debate concerning the bill. All of those who participated in the debate referred to the use of the Income Tax Act and the negative income tax method to achieve the policy objective of the bill. While I do not wish to enter into a debate on this, I understand that the method used is a combination of the universality and selectivity method of delivering financial assistance to mothers of children—and I use that term loosely as in some cases it may be fathers or other custodians of children. The Income Tax Act was considered to be the least costly method by which to implement this policy objective.

A task force was set up in 1976 to study the possibility of integrating social programs with the personal income tax system. That task force reported in 1977, and on August 24 of this year the Minister of Finance announced the government's intention to introduce changes in the overall tax benefits program. Bill C-10 is the result. I believe all honourable senators received a copy of that report.

It has been alleged that by requiring the reporting of the total income of both spouses there is discrimination against married couples because of the fact that people living common-law are not required to report both incomes. There is no question but that there is discrimination, if it can be called that. However, in contrast, there are certain benefits under the Income Tax Act to which those living common-law are not entitled. In any case, assurances have been given by the minister that the situation will be studied. Perhaps a method may be found to correct the imbalance if it is found to be of significant proportion.

It has been mentioned that at the present time only six of the provincial governments have agreed to go along with the federal government. The minister assures me that active discussions have been taking place, and she is hopeful that all provincial governments will see the justification of the position taken by the federal government.

Senator Croll raised the point that there is nothing in Bill C-10 for those in the 60 to 65 age group. That is so. This bill deals with children's allowances. The situation of those in the 55 to 65 age group is of concern to the government, and I understand it is something which is being given careful consideration.

Honourable senators, I have attempted to give as clear an explanation as possible of the thrust of this bill, and I hope it will receive your favourable consideration.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Barrow moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SIXTY-FIFTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, BONN, WEST GERMANY—
DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bonnell calling the attention of the Senate to the Sixty-fifth Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Bonn, West Germany, 5th to 13th September, 1978, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.—(Honourable Senator Bosa).

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I wish to yield to Senator Neiman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, Senator Bosa has been kind enough to adjourn this debate on my behalf these past few weeks in the hope that my voice would recover to the extent that I could say a few words to you with respect to the Inter-Parliamentary Union. While I was not at the meeting held in Bonn this past fall, I had prepared some notes following the meeting I attended in Lisbon, Portugal, in the spring, and I would like at this time to expand upon a few remarks which Senator Molgat made with respect to the work of the Inter-Parliamentary Union.

I do not know what the experience of other honourable senators has been, but when I first came here I received letters from the various parliamentary groups and associations urging me to join. I faithfully sent in my $5 fee to a variety of associations, the activities of most of which I have never had an opportunity to take part in or, indeed, wanted to take part in for one reason or another. But I have enjoyed very much the work of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, and I have tried to concentrate my efforts with that association alone.

It will not hurt those of you who have not taken part in the conferences of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, and who have interests elsewhere, if I remind you that this is a venerable and distinguished international parliamentary institution, which was founded in 1889 through the efforts of an English member of Parliament and French député, who envisaged a forum where members of democratically elected parliaments could meet and exchange ideas, regardless of their individual political beliefs, at a personal rather than a formal government level. They hoped to promote understanding, arouse concern and encourage mutual action on worldwide problems. Although the early conferences must have been carried out in that spirit, changes in practice, if not in the original idealistic concept, have inevitably occurred.

Since World War II, in particular, new nations have literally proliferated, and most of them have been admitted to the Union on the basis that their constitutions were founded and their governments organized on democratic principles. The concepts of some of those countries, however, of what constitutes democratic parliamentary government are not necessarily the same as ours, or even the same as one another.

The various international alliances or alignments are another complicating factor. The forces of national ideologies and loyalties have tended to push the Union from its original path, so that today its delegates too often debate and vote in seemingly pre-ordained and pre-arranged national or international blocs rather than as individual parliamentarians.

I recall my feelings of frustration and discouragement as I listened to rancorous debates during my first session at the fall conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union in London in 1975. Like Senator Molgat, I questioned the direction it was taking, and even whether it wanted to act with any concerted purpose. It seemed to me at that time that the Union was no more than a microcosm of the United Nations during some of its more unproductive moments. After having attended a few more conferences, however, I have been encouraged to observe that certain of the alliances which I had at first thought were firmly fixed were, in fact, not necessarily so. Moreover, member nations and even individuals could be persuaded to act independently when won over by arguments which appealed to their national interest or their own personal convictions.

Again like Senator Molgat, I would like the Inter-Parliamentary Union to be something more than a debating society whose principal objective is simply to pass resolutions approving or condemning the acts of certain governments, or urging governments to take certain action, or even to desist from taking certain action. That can become a very sterile exercise. My feeling is that the Inter-Parliamentary Union can do much better than simply be a purveyor of pious exhortations to member governments. We can and should do something ourselves within the Union to help realize the goals we support and on which we want action.

The other day, Senator Molgat gave us a couple of examples of areas in which the Inter-Parliamentary Union has taken and continues to take effective action. An example of which I have some personal knowledge—and for the implementation of which Canada can take a modest amount of credit—is the procedure which has been set up for examining possible violations of human rights against parliamentarians in various countries around the world, whether or not their governments are members of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. I should like to take a few moments just to tell you a bit about that particular procedure.

As a topic for debate in the Inter-Parliamentary Union, the subject of the torture of human beings was apparently first raised at the sixty-first conference which was held in Tokyo in 1974. During the course of debate there, and at subsequent conferences, the subject matter evolved to the question of violation of the rights of human beings, but there was no consensus whatsoever as to what should be done about it, or indeed if the Inter-Parliamentary Union should concern itself with matters which many countries argued were of internal concern.

I listened to the subject being debated at the first conference which I attended in London, in the fall of 1975, where I heard vigorous opposition to the proposal that it be placed on the agenda. Certain member nations, who undoubtedly had their own reasons for being sensitive to the probability of having more international spotlights turned on what they considered to be their internal activities, opposed the proposal on the grounds that there were already several international agencies dealing with the question, and that anything the Union could do would simply be a duplication of their efforts and would, therefore, be an unnecessary waste of its time and money. Other member nations were anxious that the subject be debated and that the Union take some positive action to deal with the problem.

At the spring meeting in Mexico City in 1976, the Canadian delegation revised the draft resolution so as to direct the Union to confine its efforts in connection with violations of human rights solely to those alleged against parliamentarians, and to set up a small committee to inquire into such allegations. As you would expect, there was vigorous debate in plenary session on the draft resolution, but we managed to have it passed with a very comfortable and comforting majority. I can remember one of the delegates from an Asian nation which supported us telling me later how glad he was that we had won, and then adding that the question might never be of personal importance to Canadians in their own country but could very well be to his fellow countrymen in the future.

That resolution was then approved by the full session of the Inter-Parliamentary Union at its fall conference in Madrid, as a result of which a special committee consisting of representatives from five member nations was set up to implement procedures which had been prescribed by the Union in order to examine possible violations of human rights against parliamentarians. That committee was set up in January 1977, and it has been meeting periodically in Geneva with the Secretary General of the Union, who handles the correspondence and investigations on its behalf. The committee reports on the results of its efforts to each session of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. As Senator Molgat has told you, we believe that its efforts have achieved some successes.

The Canadian group intends to co-operate fully with the special committee in trying to obtain the release of parliamentarians in all parts of the world who appear to have been wrongfully imprisoned, without due process of law, or who otherwise have had their human rights violated.

In addition, we have instituted another procedure in Canada. The Minister of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Don Jamieson, gave us permission to meet with officials of his department in order to work out a procedure whereby we could obtain information and generally assist one another in this matter. I had a meeting with Mr. Geoffrey Pearson, Director-General of the Bureau of United Nations Affairs in the department, last spring, and with him and other members of his bureau set up a system through which we felt we could work together. Mr. Pearson, in a subsequent letter to us, suggested various ways in which his bureau could co-operate with us as a Canadian delegation, or as individuals, in trying to help people who, we had heard, were wrongfully imprisoned. That procedure, of course, is necessarily slow and careful, but his bureau has worked it out in such a way that we feel it has had some beneficial effect.

Inevitably, various diplomatic barricades have been encountered, and we have to work slowly at it. Nevertheless, we do know that the constant pressure of international opinion and inquiry is having its effect. At the Lisbon meeting, the special committee reported the release of a former senator of Argentina about whom it had been making inquiries. Of course, it was not just the efforts of that committee but of other bodies such as Amnesty International which finally induced the Government of Argentina to release the senator. Still, Canadian parliamentarians can take some satisfaction that an intervention on their behalf may have played some part in obtaining the freedom of one of their colleagues who had been unjustly treated and imprisoned.

The Inter-Parliamentary Union has the opportunity to initiate and take action in many fields, and to give assistance not only to individuals but to nations. For that reason we should continue to support it. But such support, in my view, should not simply be a passive acceptance of what may be outdated procedures which are unwieldy and difficult to fashion into effective instruments of action.

The Canadian government, like every other member nation, has an obligation to ensure that its representatives at a conference are fully aware of the challenges as well as the opportunities the Inter-Parliamentary Union offers to them. Some of us may feel that our contribution can be only relatively small and unimportant, but I do believe it is a privilege to be allowed to make it, and that we are obliged to make it as meaningful and as effective as possible.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 11, at 8 p.m.

UNITED NATIONS

THIRTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators will be aware that yesterday marked the thirtieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, for it was on December 10, 1948, that the United Nations General Assembly, meeting in San Francisco, made this meritorious proclamation.

Considering the diversity of the international communities involved, it was an exceptional example of productive co-operation. We as Canadians can look back with pride that one of the people responsible for the publication of the declaration was a Canadian, Dr. John P. Humphrey. At that time he was Director of the United Nations Human Rights Division. He oversaw the drafting of the declaration. It is only right that today, more than 30 years later, he spoke on behalf of Canada at a special commemorative meeting of the United Nations General Assembly in New York.

The principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights have been defined in more than 20 international agreements. The principles contained in those agreements promised people throughout the world freedom and dignity. Unhappily, the noble words in the declaration have not been acted upon.

In many instances, certain members of the United Nations have been hypocritical—and it is the only word to employ. The Honourable Secretary of State for External Affairs was blunt on this subject when he addressed a Conference on International Human Rights in October.

Then he said, "Over the past decade, the United Nations performance in dealing with gross abuses of human rights has been dismal. There has been a lack of common will to take action in many serious situations. A double standard has been in operation. Action has been taken in only a few situations, where the United Nations majority considered that the political situation as well as the human rights situation warranted action." But, in the same speech, Mr. Jamieson said there have been signs in the past year that the United Nations majority may be coming to accept that it is important to take action in situations of gross and persistent violence to individual groups.

This is encouraging, honourable senators, particularly in a world where Amnesty International places some 60 countries on its list of nations practising torture. Freedom House has another 100 on its list of societies, which judged from the western democratic point of view are not free.

The thirtieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is an opportunity for all Canadians to renew our commitment to the ideals expressed in the declaration.

We as a nation can take pride in the fact that since World War II Canada has resettled more than 350,000 people who had been persecuted and displaced from their own lands. It was only recently that the Canadian decision to offer a home to the refugees from Vietnam met with the approval of all of Canada's political parties and the people they represent.

In Canada it is a positive step that we now have a Human Rights Commission under the chairmanship of that respected former parliamentarian, Gordon Fairweather.

So, fellow senators, let us praise those international statesmen of 30 years ago who drew up the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and let us ensure that we remain committed to the principles it contains.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, generally speaking I endorse what the Leader of the Government has just said.

The Declaration of Human Rights was proclaimed thirty years ago. We can ask ourselves whether it is a celebration or not. I think the answer should be yes and no.

Yes, because some progress was made in many countries, including Canada. The Leader of the Government emphasized what has been made in Canada in general. We passed the Bill of Rights in 1961. On the provincial level, human rights charters were passed by almost all legislatures in their area of jurisdiction. There is now talk of enshrining a human rights charter in the Canadian Constitution. Canada has done much to help those who are persecuted elsewhere, whose rights are being denied. Granted, but it must also be said that discrimination still exists. The Human Rights Commissions, both federal and provincial alike, could prove that there is still considerable discrimination.

Yes on the one hand, but no on the other, because in many regards not only has progress been slow but we have also had our set-backs. It is strange to think that, while we are commemorating—I am not saying celebrating but commemorating—the 30th anniversary of that declaration, in some countries the situation is worse than it was 30 years ago.

As the Leader of the Government pointed out, imprisonment and torture, for political reasons, still exist today. Moreover, many countries which endorsed the declaration have made a mockery of it in fact.

But we must not despair, though man still seems to act like a wolf towards his fellow man. Truly, it is strange that there is still, in our nature, that tendency towards brutality and lack of respect for others. It stems perchance from the original sin. In any event, be that as it may, while recognizing the progress we have witnessed in the last 30 years, which was a step forward, let us not be blind to the fact that in many other countries ground has been lost. There is still much to be done and, even here, we must resolve anew to respect not only the letter but also the spirit of that declaration.

THE CONSTITUTION

RECONSTITUTION OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on November 7 the Honourable Senator Asselin asked this question:

Is the government interested in reconstituting the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution?

Honourable senators, on November 2, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister stated in the other place that he would consider the immediate reconstitution of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on the Constitution. However, no decision on the matter has yet been made. It may also be noted that on November 3 the Prime Minister stated that he was in favour of holding a debate in the other place on the subject of constitutional reform, the suggestion being that perhaps this may be a prelude to reconstitution of the committee.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MCDONALD ROYAL COMMISSION—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on November 7 the Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester) asked a question related to "that ongoing enterprise frequently referred to as the 'McDonald Inquiry'". He said he had been informed that:

... there is constantly appearing before the commission individual solicitors for two former ministers of the Crown whose conduct is apparently the subject of some inquiry.

In accordance with normal practice in similar matters, ministers or former ministers who may be the object of allegations before the McDonald Commission, or who may be called to testify before the commission in relation to matters pertaining to acts performed in their capacity as ministers, are represented by counsel retained and paid on their behalf by the government.

● (2015)

The same policy applies to other officials or former officials of the government and to members or former members of the RCMP.

Where, by reason of a public inquiry, the conduct of an official or a minister becomes the subject of scrutiny, it would be unfair to require such official or minister to provide for legal representation at his own expense. In fact, the question of the payment of fees to legal counsel representing witnesses or other persons before public inquiries has often been raised.

In England, the Royal Commission on Tribunals of Inquiry, presided over by the Right Honourable Lord Justice Salmon, published its report in 1966. In that report the question of payment of legal fees to persons legally represented before a commission of inquiry was raised, and the suggestion was made that the commission of inquiry be given the powers to pay, out of public funds, legal fees of persons appearing before the commission. The Laycraft inquiry in Alberta provided for payment of legal fees for persons appearing before the commission.

The course followed in this respect for the McDonald Commission is, therefore, not an unusual one and one which is dictated by rules of fairness.

PUBLIC WORKS AND URBAN AFFAIRS

RESPONSIBILITY FOR HOUSING—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: On November 28, Honourable Senator Marshall asked a question about the Ministry of Public Works. He asked who shall assume the responsibility for ensuring "that housing, repairs to housing and policies in housing are directed to the benefit of the people of Canada"?

I should like to inform honourable senators that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation reports to a minister of the Crown designated by the Governor in Council. This was the situation before the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs was established, when CMHC reported, in turn, to the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Public Works, the Postmaster General, and the Minister of Transport, among others.

The decision to abolish the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs, at the end of March 1979, is a decisive gesture on the part of the federal government that clearly indicates that the government is ready to act in revisions of responsibility between the various levels of government. It is also a demonstration of the federal government's moving to reduce the duplication of effort in the field of municipal affairs and in the field of housing in general. The government has agreed to disentangle itself from project approval and the detailed review and monitoring of such NHA programs as neighbourhood improvement, municipal infrastructure and public housing where the provinces and municipalities should have the active role.

Mr. Hession continues as President of CMHC, appointed by order in council, and is the chief operating officer of the day-to-day operations of the corporation. Mr. William Teron is a member of the board of directors of CMHC, under a term appointment, and has been selected to be the chairman of that board. He will continue to serve as policy adviser on housing to the Government of Canada through the responsible minister.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SAFETY OF CANADIAN CITIZENS IN IRAN—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In view of the deteriorating political situation in Iran, and in view of the fact that it was reported in the press last Saturday that a substantial number of American citizens have been repatriated, what are the intentions of this government concerning Canadian citizens residing in that country.

Senator Perrault: As of 8 o'clock this evening there had been no further word from the Department of External Affairs with respect to the situation in Iran. However, honourable senators are aware of the fact that Canadian aircraft have been on stand-by to evacuate Canadians should any danger to their welfare come to exist.

THE SENATE

INFORMATIONAL PUBLICATIONS—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: I would ask the Leader of the Government when we can look forward to an up-dating of the seating plan of the Senate chamber and the publication of same.

Senator Perrault: I agree with honourable senators who are critical of the literature currently distributed to those who visit the Senate chamber. It is clearly inadequate and does not meet the current needs of the Senate.

A number of new proposals have been considered. A certain amount of visual material has been prepared. I hope that over the next few months it may be possible for the Senate to consider a new publication describing more adequately the operations of this chamber. This is a matter that I would be pleased to discuss with the Leader of the Opposition and other senators. Certainly, the communication program of the Senate should be enhanced and extended. It is obvious that there are many Canadians who do not understand the activities undertaken in this chamber, and certainly there is need for a substantial revision of the material provided to visitors entering the Senate gallery.

Senator Riley: May I ask a supplementary question. Is the leader referring now to an upgrading or updating of the seating arrangement, or is he referring to the publication of another pamphlet, which I understand was discussed more than a year ago, setting out the history of the Senate, the reason for its existence, its functions and duties?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I express a personal view when I say the present pamphlet being distributed to visitors entering the Senate gallery should be replaced as soon as possible. The present pamphlet does not properly convey to the citizens of Canada the activities of this chamber. The rough draft of a proposed new pamphlet portrays more fully the work and function of the Senate, and it also provides more pictorial material.

Senator Riley: I have a further supplementary question. A publication that is on sale in the tourist information booth near the Hall of Honour is directed to the function of Parliament as a whole, but it makes only a brief reference to the Senate. I understood that a similar publication about the Senate was going to be made available to the public either by sale or free distribution. Is this what the leader has in mind?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the type of publication program that is supported by many senators would involve two basic items. First, a small booklet that would be distributed to those visiting the Senate. This would replace the pamphlet Senator Bosa held aloft this evening. Secondly, there would be a counterpart of the publication of the other place which is sold to visitors. In the best interest of the Senate, I would suggest that both these documents are required. In this regard, certain discussions have been held with respect to the cost of such a project.

The Senate is mindful of the necessity to budget prudently at this particular time when all government departments and activities pertaining to government are under scrutiny, and properly so. However, there is no question about the need for both types of separate publications.

● (2025)

Senator Riley: Assuming that such a publication was sold to the public, as is the case with the publication relating mainly to the other place, would not a great deal of the cost be recovered?

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh!

Senator Riley: Is that for my benefit, senator?

Senator Flynn: I am just wondering whether it would be in as much demand as you might wish.

Senator Riley: I understand that the publication dealing with the other place enjoys wide circulation. Besides, your picture would be more widely circulated, as would those of some of your colleagues on that side.

Senator Perrault: The proposal would be to recover a substantial amount of the production costs, and hopefully to show a profit. However, such a proposition would be subject to the vagaries of free enterprise and the law of supply and demand. I can tell honourable senators that the photographs have been taken for such a publication, and in their excellence they are unrivalled in Parliament.

THE LATE GOLDA MEIR

CANADA'S REPRESENTATIVES AT FUNERAL OF FORMER PRIME MINISTER OF ISRAEL—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government inform the Senate who will officially represent Canada at the funeral of the former Prime Minister of Israel, Golda Meir?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Canadian delegation is being headed by the Honourable Barnett Danson, Minister of National Defence. I do not have a complete list at my desk of who else will be in the official party.

FUGITIVE OFFENDERS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-9, respecting fugitive offenders in Canada, which was presented Thursday, December 7.

Senator McIlraith moved the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Flynn: Next sitting.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I am quite agreeable to having this bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting if the Leader of the Opposition feels there is someone on that side of the house who may wish to debate it; otherwise, I would move third reading now.

Senator Flynn: If the honourable senator thinks there is any advantage in having third reading this evening, I have no objection.

Senator McIlraith: There is no advantage; there is no urgency. I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

STATUTE LAW (METRIC CONVERSION) AMENDMENT BILL, 1978

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, December 6, the debate on the motion of Senator Molgat for the second reading of Bill S-10, to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement.

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure once again to make a humble contribution to the debates of this house, and on this occasion to voice my support for Bill S-10, to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement.

The conversion to the metric system of measurement is, in my view, long overdue. Notwithstanding that, it is not widely welcomed in our society. My few remarks this evening may not have the flavour of poetry, but they are based upon my own personal experience.

[Translation]

The conversion across the board to a new system of measurements, with the vagaries of the thing if I may say so, is not something we can do overnight. We have been living all our lives with a system learned in grade school and which met our needs without too many complications.

To most of us, the old conventional system, the imperial one, will still be with us for 20 years at least. We must first go through a period of change. Only the new generation will say goodbye to a system that served us so well in our lifetime.

● (2030)

[English]

There is no doubt in my mind that Bill S-10 covers just a few of the items required for a complete conversion to the metric system. It is only a start. The federal commission in charge of conversion, under the chairmanship of Mr. D. R. B. McArthur, has made remarkable progress, but according to the commission's own admission it will take several years before we can feel the effect of the transformation on the economy of the country. After several hearings across the country with various organizations, the commission came to the conclusion that the most urgent need for total conversion is in the industrial sector. An international organization known as La Conférence Générale des Poids et Mesures, with its head office in Sèvres, France, has in several instances drawn attention to the need for a unified system of measurement throughout the world. Canada is still on the conventional system, although most imported goods such as automobiles, airplanes, farm machinery and many others, have pushed Canada towards the adoption of the metric system, willing or not.

Honourable senators, let me come to the point. Why do I recommend the metric system? This is based on my own personal experience. At the outbreak of the Second World War, Canada overnight became one of the leading arsenals supplying our troops overseas with most of their requirements. Thousands of shops, large and small, were opened to process and manufacture war equipment and supplies such as vehicles, airplanes, ships, tanks, and ammunition of all kinds. Let me tell you, honourable senators, that the first year was a complete disaster. Most of the shops were building huge scrap piles and even the large shops were not excluded from the quality control inspections which showed in several instances that the inspectors themselves failed their own tests.

Early in 1940, the Department of National Defence and Supply called upon the Vocational Branch of the Department of Education of each province to see what could be done to improve production by a vast program of training, with the result that in less than six months 82 training schools, new and old, were in operation across Canada. New courses were being planned, and the regular two-year or three-year course had to be condensed to three to four months, teaching only the requirements for the specific job. That was a completely new ballgame in the field of vocational training, and it gave rise to many problems including that of personnel and instructors. A new syllabus had to be drafted to meet requirements, because the training of instructors was a major problem.

Being the director of the Edmundston Vocational School at the time, which was transformed early in 1940 to the Edmundston Aircraft School, I was selected, with one of my colleagues from Moncton, to play a major role in the organization. First we had to verify these huge scrap piles, and then visit the industries to discuss their problems, their needs and their requirements. True enough, the industries were in great trouble and scrap piles were building up.

● (2035)

Because the school doors were open to everyone regardless of ability, education or sex, the armed forces had the first selection and we were left with the medical rejects and the students who, in normal times, would not qualify. Nevertheless, it was left up to us to qualify them and to train each one of them for certain responsible duties.

We knew from previous experience that our trainees were comprised of two categories of boys: country boys and city boys. This is not to overlook the women, about whom I will say something later. The city boys came from larger centres where they previously had access to vocational facilities, and as a result they were more knowledgeable but they were less aggressive. On the other hand, the country boys, or the farmers, were in a class of their own. Most of them could build their own houses, for example. They would dig the foundations with picks and shovels and then pour the cement. Then they would build the frame, put on the roof, do the finishing work and the painting, install the plumbing and, in many cases, the wiring. They were jacks of all trades, masters of none; they were the "chips off the old block", who built Canada before the invasion of restrictions and regulations. Those boys could do almost anything, but they could do nothing with real precision, because the dimensions they knew and used were the mile, the yard, the foot, the inch, the eighth of an inch and sometimes the sixteenth of an inch. That was about the extent of their knowledge of dimensions.

Using that meagre knowledge, they could, if they had the two parts in their hands, produce two pieces that would fit together; but if one piece was produced in one place and the second piece was produced elsewhere, there was no way they could make the two pieces fit together as matching pieces.

The point is that the defence program was designed to use all of the available space in Canada for production output, with the assembly plants being located in the larger centres. Perhaps most affected by this system design was the aircraft industry. Just assume, by way of example, that for a particular aircraft there were four parts that had to fit together perfectly, and that part one was made in Halifax, part two was made in Vancouver, part three in Edmundston and part four in Winnipeg. Each of these parts would have to match all of the others; that is, they would have to fit together perfectly. The whole thing was to be assembled in Toronto. Well, that was just impossible. If one tiny hole were drilled in the wrong place, that would ruin everything and the whole thing would go to the scrap pile.

Another problem that led to the making of costly mistakes was that the specifications and drawings were, for the most part, produced in England, with the calculations being done in the metrical system; when these drawings and specifications were brought to Canada they had to be converted to our own conventional measurements, thus opening the door to many a costly error. In this respect the main problem was that we Canadians were jacks of all trades, who did not know how to make exact measurements, who were unskilled in reading blueprints, and who lacked knowledge in the use of the metric system.

By and large Canadians did not know how to use precision instruments. Indeed, they were unknown to us. Surface plates, V-blocks, dial gauges, depth gauges, drill gauges, micrometers, vernier scales, and the dozens of others with their tolerance limits of minuses and pluses—these comprised a complete area in which we found most of our problems, and it was in this area that the schools had to concentrate their efforts.

The easiest groups to train were the women, and those who had no knowledge at all of precision tools, because they would listen to instructions. Women welders specialized in precision filing. The most difficult people were the boys and men with limited knowledge, and here I think of a garage mechanic who did not believe in a fine fit with a minute tolerance and who would not recognize the difference between standard threads and metric threads. Women quickly qualified for special jobs, such as precision filing, welding, woodwork on aircraft and, fabric patching. Women had the patience to do things regardless of time, and they did them properly. On the other hand, men would do the same piece of work in no time at all, but nothing would fit and the work would often be thrown on the scrap heap.

First, 80 per cent of world trade uses the metric system. Many Canadian companies are already deeply involved with metric measurement, particularly those that export to Europe, South America and the emerging nations of Asia and Africa. More than 50 per cent of Canadian manufactured goods are exported to metric countries. The need for Canada to adopt what is almost a universal system of measurement has become urgent if we are to maintain our position as one of the major trading nations of the world. Canada must be prepared to supply its goods in the way that importing countries desire, and that is by making use of the metric system of measurement.

Secondly, over 95 per cent of the world's population is converting to the metric system. Countries such as India, China and Japan have adopted the metric system in recent years, while Australia, New Zealand, Ceylon, Ireland and Great Britain are well advanced toward complete metric conversion. A commitment is expected shortly from the United States that it will go metric. In July 1971, a comprehensive report was sent to Congress strongly recommending that the United States government adopt the metric system of measurement. Almost all American multinational corporations in the United States are committed to converting as early as 1974.

Thirdly, the change to the metric system in commerce, industry and science appears inevitable because the world is rapidly becoming a close-knit society and Canada cannot afford to remain in isolation. Canada really has no other choice but to go metric. Industry will benefit from improved trading abilities and opportunities in world markets. The major Commonwealth countries, key outlets for Canadian manufactured goods, are all going metric. A survey conducted by the Canadian Standards Association revealed that more than 95 per cent of Canadians polled could see an advantage in switching to the metric system; and, honourable senators, so do I.

Senator Riley: I wonder if the Honourable Senator Fournier would permit a question at this time? In view of the fact that he has always been interested in highway safety and, for some considerable time, has conducted a television program on highway safety in New Brunswick, I am wondering what his opinion is regarding highway signs which designate the speed limit on the highways in kilometres only. I understand that when conversion took place in Great Britain, the highway signs, for a time, displayed the speed limit in both kilometres and miles per hour.

Does the honourable senator consider it wise, in view of the fact that many people are unfamiliar with the metric system, to have the speed limits indicated on our highway signs in both kilometres and miles per hour?

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Honourable senators, the New Brunswick Highway Safety League has received a number of complaints regarding the point raised by the honourable senator. Most of those complaints have come from Americans. The Americans still use the miles-per-hour designation on their highway signs, and when they see one of our highway signs bearing the number "90", for instance, they tend to think it means the speed limit is 90 miles per hour when, in actual fact, it is approximately 50 miles per hour. That has been the main problem. The Highway Safety Council of New Brunswick undertook a study in conjunction with the safety leagues in other provinces, and reached the conclusion that we had nothing to gain in view of the fact that the Americans are gradually converting to the metric system. I believe they will make the conversion in the near future, and, in the course of time, the problem will take care of itself. The Highway Safety League was somewhat upset at first because the highway patrols were quite severe, and were constantly handing out tickets to the Americans. It was also discovered that those Americans living along the border took advantage of the situation by speeding and then saying, as an excuse, "I didn't know."

I do not know where we go from there but, in view of the fact that the Americans have been making a tremendous effort this year, I feel sure that the problem will resolve itself in time.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I meant only that speed limit designations might possibly be in both miles and kilometres per hour used during the transitional period. Not only are the Americans concerned, but so also are many Canadians who live in rural areas. They do not receive the same amount of information that is given to school children or is acquired by those members of the public who have access to the more prominent daily newspapers. Also, many middle-aged people feel somewhat confused about the situation. Would it not be advantageous, during the transitional period, to have the speed limit designated in both kilometres and miles per hour, not only for the benefit of Americans but also of Canadians?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

● (2050)

Senator Petten moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1978-79

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-25, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1979.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill introduced today provides full supply for Supplementary Estimates (A) for 1978-79. These estimates were tabled in the Senate on November 9, and immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. They were discussed in committee on November 14 and 16 with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials. These supplementaries total $1,060 million. The total of the gross estimates to date is $49,792 million.

A major portion of these supplementary estimates, $610 million, represents revised forecasts of statutory payments including: $400 million for the additional costs of servicing the public debt; $262 million for payments to the provinces, including $109 million for contributions in respect of previous fiscal years under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act; $129 million for increased payments in respect of hospital insurance, Medicare and post-secondary education under established programs financing; $23 million in respect of the sales tax arrangements concluded earlier this year; and $368 million reduction in advances to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under the National Housing Act.

The balance of these estimates, $450 million, are to be voted by Parliament. The major items to be voted are: $81 million to meet increased oil import compensation payments resulting from the federal government's announced intention to delay the scheduled January 1, 1979, increase in domestic oil prices and the devaluation of the Canadian dollar; $50 million for the final stages of the $150 million federal labour intensive projects program, which was extended from October 1977 to September 30, 1978; $43 million to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as the net reimbursement for discounts and administrative costs incurred in respect of the sale of NHA mortgages as required under section 24(b) of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act; and $18 million for payments to Interprovincial Pipe Line Limited in respect of crude oil shipped from Sarnia through the Montreal extension of the Interprovincial Pipe Line system, as part of the government policy to increase national self-sufficiency in energy.

In addition, these estimates provide for the expansion in 1978-79, of the job experience and training program as announced in the context of employment stimulation measures for which funds were reallocated in September.

While the total gross estimates to date from the 1978-79 fiscal year is $49,792 million, I am assured by the President of the Treasury Board that after allowing for loan repayments and normal and directed lapses of authorized funding, and barring some major unforeseen new expenditure requirements, the total spending will be within the reduced ceiling of $48,300 million announced during the summer.

These estimates contain some 20 $1 items that are described in the explanatory sections of the supplementary blue book. These items may be grouped as follows: five votes that authorize the transfer of funds from one vote to another; ten votes that authorize the payment of grants and contributions; one vote that authorizes the deletion of debts and the reimbursement of an account for an accumulated deficit and obsolete stores; one vote that amends provisions of a previous Appropriation Act.

There are three other votes: one vote to authorize the issuance of non-negotiable demand notes; one vote to authorize the payment of pensions; and one vote to authorize the cancellation of certificates of indebtedness and the forgiveness of debt and interest accrued and unpaid.

Additional explanations of the items in the latter two categories were provided to the National Finance Committee during its review of the supplementary estimates.

Before I came into this house tonight I caused to be distributed to honourable senators—and I hope this has been done—two tables, one of which I have marked, for my own purposes in studying this bill, "Table A", the title of which is "Estimates, 1978-79." This table shows the details of the main estimates. First you have the column of the items to be voted. Then we have budgetary items, $19,875,760,461, and, in the same column, non-budgetary items, $877,561,001, for a total of items to be voted of $20,753,321,462.

In the next column, the statutory column, we have, budgetary, $26,600,708,718, and non-budgetary, $1,377,985,091, for a sub-total under the statutory column of main estimates of $27,978,693,809. The grand total of the estimates I have just given is $48,732,015,271.

Then I go to the bill before us, and I give the details of the supplementary estimates (A).

Under the "to be voted" items, which is the first column of the table, we have budgetary, $394,563,814, and non-budgetary, in the same column, $54,781,393, for a sub-total under this column, of the Supplementary Estimates (A), of $449,345,207.

● (2100)

In the next column under the heading "Supplementary Estimates (A)—Statutory", we have a budgetary figure of $975,286,000; a non-budgetary figure of minus $365,078,052, and there is a reduction or revision taken into account that gives us a sub-total of $610,207,948; for a grand total of the supplementary estimates of $1,059,553,155.

The last paragraph of this table shows the total estimates tabled. You have the figures dealing with budgetary items. I will only give the totals: budgetary, $47,846,318,993; non-budgetary, $1,945,249,433; for a grand total of estimates tabled of $49,791,568,426.

The second table, which I have marked for my own purposes "Table B", bears the title "Supply, 1978-79". This is a résumé of the appropriation acts passed in respect of the estimates for 1978-79 to date. There was, as honourable senators will recall, an Appropriation Act No. 1, 1978-79, which granted interim supply for April, May and June, including 23 additional proportions based on the main estimates for 1978-79, for a total of $5,657,022,492. This was followed by Appropriation Act No. 2, 1978-79, which granted supply for the balance of the main estimates for 1978-79, for a total of $15,096,298,970.

The present bill totals $449,345,207. The total estimates to be voted to date is $21,202,666,669.

In closing, I should like to add that this bill is in the same form as those passed in previous years and contains no additional borrowing authority. I probably have given too many figures, and they are not small ones. I believe I have covered the important features of this bill, but should honourable senators wish further explanations, I shall do my best to provide them.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Smith (Colchester), debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 8 p.m.

INCOME TAX ACT FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, December 12, 1978

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred Bill C-10, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973" has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, December 7, 1978, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

Salter A. Hayden,
Chairman.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, with leave, now.

Senator Flynn: We will give leave because the minister is very anxious to have this bill passed. I understand that royal assent has been arranged to take place tonight, which is better than tomorrow afternoon when we will be preoccupied with other functions.

I told the minister last week that if the only urgency about this bill was to have the forms printed in time for the beginning of the year she could proceed right away. I also told her that with this assurance coming from me, no other assurance was necessary.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE CONSTITUTION

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, 13th December 1978, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Leave having been given to revert to reports of committees:

Senator Forsey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented the following report:

Monday, December 11, 1978

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Third Report as follows:

1. In relation to its permanent reference, section 26, The Statutory Instruments Act, 1970-71-72, c. 38, your Committee has considered the statutory instruments set out in Annex A to this Report, and has determined that the special attention of both Houses requires to be drawn to them.

2. Each of the statutory instruments under report purports to empower the Minister to direct some other person to enter private lands and to remove excessive natural growth. The extent to which natural growth is excessive is defined in each case. The empowering of the Minister so to act is a new departure in the regulation of natural growth on lands adjacent to airports. Previously, Airport Zoning Regulations forbade owners or occupiers of controlled lands to permit any object of natural growth to exceed certain defined limits.

3. Your Committee does not consider that paragraph (j) of section 6(1) of the Aeronautics Act provides the authority for the conferring of this new power on the Minister. Your Committee further considers that such an extraordinary power as that to enter private lands and to destroy natural growth on them should not be conferred by subordinate legislation unless the enabling statute clearly empowers such legislation to be made. Accordingly, your Committee considers that the statutory instruments under report even if intra vires section 6 of the Aeronautics Act, constitute unusual and unexpected uses of the power contained in that section.

4. Your Committee, therefore, recommends that Parliament should be asked to consider an amendment to the Aeronautics Act to provide the necessary explicit authority for statutory instruments of the type under report, should they be thought necessary by the Department of Transport.

5. A letter dated June 21, 1978 from the Senior Assistant Deputy Minister of Transport explaining the statutory instruments under report and setting out the Department of Transport's position is appended as Annex B to this report.

June 21, 1978

Mr. G. C. Eglington, Counsel, Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, c/o The Senate, Ottawa, Ontario. K1A 0A4

Dear Mr. Eglington;

Re: Airport Zoning Regulations—new provisions dealing with "Natural Growth"

This refers to your letter of February 28, 1978, requesting an explanation concerning the inclusion of the above-noted new provisions in Airport Zoning Regulations and their validity under section 6 of the Aeronautics Act.

The natural growth zoning provisions were added to the zoning regulations as a result of difficulties encountered in certain areas adjacent to airports where natural growth was becoming a problem and the owners of such property refused to co-operate with the Department or to give the Department an Easement to control such natural growth.

Section 6 which prohibits natural growth was considered of little value unless there was some method of enforcement indicated by the Minister. For even if a charge was laid, that would not result in the natural growth being removed. Under subsection (2) of section 6 of the Act, a regulation may empower the Minister to make a direction in respect of any matter coming within section 6(1) of the Act as the regulation may prescribe. Section 6(1)(j) empowers the Minister to make regulations restricting, regulating or prohibiting excessive natural growth or suffering excessive natural growth to be permitted. By section 7 of the zoning regulations he directs that excessive natural growth will not be suffered on the lands affected by the regulation.

Although section 7 may be of doubtful validity, it was considered to be a simple method to resolve this problem. While it has had the desired effect through cooperation by affected parties, it has never been challenged and therefore we have no precedent against which we can determine its validity.

Yours sincerely,

S. D. Cameron,

Senior Assistant Deputy Minister.

Respectfully submitted,

Eugene A. Forsey,

Joint Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Forsey moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SAFETY OF CANADIAN CITIZENS IN IRAN—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Even though assurances have been given both here and in the other place that Canadians in Iran are comparatively safe, reports from individual families, particularly those in Newfoundland, now indicate that that is not necessarily the situation.

In view of the fact that there are some families in the Caspian Sea area in the north, who, having by design intended to move to the Resht Airport, now find that because of the upheaval they cannot get to the airport, which would be their avenue of escape, could the leader find out immediately just what the situation is? I ask this because there is growing concern from mothers of families over there, mothers of workers. If this concern is well founded, consideration should be given to getting these workers out of Iran.

Senator Perrault: If any honourable senator has information with respect to relatives or friends in Iran who are perceived to be in danger, I urge that he or she contact the Department of External Affairs as soon as possible and provide full information, giving names, addresses, contact numbers, and so on.

As of 8 o'clock this evening I had no information from the Department of External Affairs suggesting that the situation with respect to the safety of Canadian citizens in Iran had deteriorated in the last 24 hours.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

REISMAN REPORT ON THE CANADIAN AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: If I may direct a question to the Leader of the Government, now that the government has received the Reisman report on the automotive manufacturing industry in Canada, is it the intention of the government to consult the industries affected before formulating its policy on the matter?

Senator Perrault: That question will be taken as notice.

TRANSPORT

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY—TIRE PRESSURE SURVEY—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Has the government authorized a survey or study to ascertain whether the owners of Canadian motor vehicles are correctly inflating their tires? If so, what is the nature and purpose of the inquiry and what is its estimated cost?

Senator Perrault: The government has been quite concerned with inflation over the recent months, and I hasten to say "inflation in every sense of the word". I do not know of any current study on tire inflation, but I will certainly make inquiries.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I have good reason to believe that such a survey is taking place, I may say.

Senator Perrault: That information will be obtained as soon as possible.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

RETURN OF COSSETTE-TRUDELS TO CANADA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, on Tuesday, December 5, I asked a question about the Cossette-Trudels couple. The Leader of the Government partly answered my question the following day, but I should like to know now if he is in a position to answer the rest of my question about whether the Government of Canada and the Cossette-Trudels had reached any agreement at the time of Mr. Cross's release before they were exiled to Cuba and thence to France. Is the leader in possession of any document that he can table in the Senate that would inform us of any such agreement?

● (2015)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a body of information before me with respect to the Cossette-Trudels. I can confirm that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated in recent hours that the Cossette-Trudels have asked the Canadian government for permission to return to Canada. Yesterday, December 11, the Cossette-Trudels asked the Canadian embassy in Paris to issue special travel documents for their return to Canada. The Canadian government agreed and our embassy issued the couple with temporary passports, valid only for their return to Canada. Now that this has been done, the French authorities will permit them to leave France. As a matter of courtesy, Canada will, of course, inform the French authorities of all arrangements.

Honourable senators, in reply to Senator Asselin's specific question of December 5 as to what arrangements had been made between the Canadian government and the Cossette-Trudels when they left Canada after releasing Mr. Cross, may I say that insofar as the Department of External Affairs is concerned, the federal government agreed to provide the kidnappers of Mr. Cross with free exit from Montreal, through Man and His World, to Cuba. The federal government also agreed to provide the kidnappers with appropriate travel documents in the form of a collective travel certificate valid for travel to Cuba, air passage with certain members of their families to Cuba and assurances that the Cuban government was prepared to accept them. The Cossette-Trudels were included in these arrangements. It was always understood that should the Cossette-Trudels return to Canada, they would be prosecuted for the crimes alleged against them. Prosecution is, of course, within the jurisdiction of the Attorney General for Quebec.

Senator Flynn: I have a supplementary question. Apparently no document was ever signed. I was wondering whether the Leader of the Government heard the comment made by Premier Lévesque regarding the fact that the role played by the then Minister of Justice, Mr. John Turner, might be revealed on the occasion of the trial. Was the then Minister of Justice part of the deal?

Senator Perrault: I have no information before me on that. It would be wrong for me to comment on an alleged news report of a statement allegedly made by the Premier of Quebec.

Senator Flynn: I heard it.

Senator Langlois: It is a news report just the same.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WIDOWS OF VETERANS—PENSIONS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on November 21, Senator Marshall asked the Leader of the Government if he would consult with the Minister of Veterans Affairs to determine what progress is being made with regard to the inclusion of widows of veterans receiving disability pensions who are receiving a rate of less than 48 per cent.

I have contacted the minister and have been provided with the following answer:

Under the existing legislation, a widow is entitled to be pensioned if the veteran's death was attributable to service, or if he was, at the time of his death, in receipt of a pension for disability assessed at 48 per cent or more, or if after his death it is determined that he would have been in receipt of a pension at the 48 per cent rate or more, had he applied for such a pension or increase in pension before his death.

The 48 per cent rate was decided upon because at that rate it can be considered that the veteran is obviously seriously disabled, and it could be considered that the pensionable condition might have contributed to the pensioner's death. On the other hand, where a veteran is pensioned at a lower rate and dies from a cause having no relation to his pensioned condition, the question arises as to whether, or to what extent, pension should be payable for a death unrelated to service in the forces.

I am not aware of any of our major western wartime allies who provide for the automatic payment of pensions to widows even approaching the 48 per cent basis for entitlement which we in Canada use.

However, the Pension Act is continually under review to ensure that the legislation is the best possible to meet the needs of our veterans and their dependents, consistent with what the economy of the country can sustain.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, the minister has given that answer on a number of occasions in recent years. It should be pointed out that if a veteran in receipt of a 48 per cent pension dies, his widow receives, I believe, a pension of $466. However, if that veteran was in receipt of a 47 per cent pension—a mere 1 per cent or $38.92 less—his widow receives nothing and she is cast aside.

If that is regarded as being fair, despite the fact that we do have good pension legislation, then I cannot understand it. It should be pointed out to the minister that this is discriminatory. It is against human rights and everything that is fair in Canada.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only reiterate what the minister said in his statement, that the government has demonstrated its compassion and concern for the veterans of Canada. Indeed, veterans benefits in this country are perhaps better than those in any other country in the world. Every effort is made continually to improve those benefits, and hopefully it will be possible at some future date to provide even greater assistance.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

COMMITMENT BY GOVERNMENT LEADER RESPECTING REPRESENTATIONS BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a number of questions have been asked in recent days by the Leader of the Opposition with respect to a Senate committee study of labour relations in this country. I want this evening to make a brief statement on the subject.

The subject of labour-management relations in Canada has occupied a great deal of the attention of government and of all the political parties over recent months. The strike and lock-out record in Canada has not been as satisfactory as any of us would wish, and there is general feeling among the parties, and at various levels of government, that we must try new approaches, initiate studies and surveys, have a greater dialogue involving labour, management and the general public.

The idea of a Senate study has been discussed over recent months among honourable senators and certainly within the government. I can report that leading representatives of labour and management have just agreed unanimously in the Second Tier Report, which flowed out of the 23 Sectoral Studies, to undertake a joint study, without government, of all the issues in industrial relations that have been troubling many Canadians, including members of the Senate.

It is the feeling of the government that we should allow this extremely constructive development to go forward unhindered and unimpeded by any parliamentary study—which labour and management would not be at all happy about under present conditions—at least for the time being. We are entering a period during which there will be a substantial amount of dialogue between labour and management, and it is the view of the government that we should let this dialogue proceed before parliamentary studies are initiated.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, am I to understand from the statement made by the Leader of the Government that he now considers no longer binding his commitment to have a Senate committee—perhaps the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science—hear representations from those who wanted to be heard when we were considering the amendments to the Canada Labour Code in the last session? In view of the changed circumstances, does his commitment no longer stand?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is not a question of breaking faith in this matter. Rather it is a suggestion that there should be a deferral, because it is felt a parliamentary study might be detrimental in that it would interfere with, and perhaps break, what can only be described as a fragile agreement which labour and management have made to look at their own house themselves. I suggest they should be given every opportunity to improve their relations by agreement between themselves before we in the Senate enter the process. It is not something I rule out at all. It is simply the timing.

Senator Flynn: We are postponing it.

Senator Perrault: We are simply deferring it to a more appropriate time, a time when the Senate may be even more helpful.

Senator Flynn: The commitment was made at a very appropriate time, but this is not an appropriate time to honour it.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1978-79

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for the second reading of Bill C-25, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1979.

Hon. George I. Smith: Honourable senators, I do not rise to oppose passage of this bill, but there are some things about it which I feel should be drawn to your attention.

I apologize to the Deputy Leader of the Government, the sponsor of this bill, for not being present last night when he so ably moved the second reading. I have, however, read his very careful explanation and studied the charts and tables of an explanatory nature which he was kind enough to supply to honourable senators.

I note that the bill covers supplementary estimates of some $1.06 billion. I note also that $610 million is said to be due to revised forecasts of statutory payments, and $450 million is left to be voted by Parliament. I note further that should this bill pass it will bring the total estimates voted for this fiscal year to $49.722 billion or, as near as may be, $50 billion.

With reference to the revised forecasts of statutory items, I suppose it would probably be unfair to say that this is in any way due to poor estimating. In all probability, it is due simply to the difficulties which are inherent in trying to determine, many months in advance, what the actual requirements for a year will be.

The sponsor of the bill mentioned a number of major items to be voted. I shall refer, for the time being at least, to only one of them, and that can be found at page 346 of yesterday's Hansard. The words of the sponsor of the bill in this particular connection are as follows:

The major items to be voted are: $81 million to meet increased oil import compensation payments resulting from the federal government's announced intention to delay the scheduled January 1, 1979, increase in domestic oil prices and the devaluation of the Canadian dollar—

The thought that occurred to me in reading those words—and, incidentally, I heard something similar said by the President of the Treasury Board when he appeared before the National Finance Committee—is that the subjects of an increase in oil import compensation payments and the devaluation of the Canadian dollar represent a strange combination of subjects to put into one item. I do not notice any breakdown in the deputy leader's very clear remarks to indicate how much of this $81 million is referable to oil, and how much is referable to the cost of the devaluation of the dollar. Perhaps the deputy leader might consider the possibility also of indicating just what was the nature of that portion of the cost of $81 million which arises out of the devaluation of the dollar.

As I say, this seems to me to be a somewhat strange combination of items, but stranger still, honourable senators, is the unilateral way by which this item got into these estimates and, therefore, into this bill. Supplementary estimates (A), which are the estimates dealt with by this bill, were printed many weeks ago. I do not have the date of the printing before me, but I know they were printed long enough ago for them to find their way to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance by the 14th day of November, 1978. My recollection is—and I am sure honourable senators will remember this too—that as recently as the last federal-provincial conference of first ministers, held just a couple of week ago, this matter had not been settled—that is, the matter of the scheduled increase in the price of oil on January 1, 1979—so just how it was known that it ought to be included in these estimates many weeks ago is difficult to see, except that the federal government unilaterally announced that it intended to break a contract between itself and the government of Alberta. It seems to me that this was obviously a unilateral approach to what seemed to be treated at the first ministers' conference that I mentioned, and by the parties attending it, as a firm and sacred contract. The least one can say about this kind of thing is that it is not very well calculated to improve relations between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces. It is certainly not a very good way to promote national unity.

I cannot help but say that this is clearly another unilateral action by the federal government, and another of the many instances of its lack of consultation with interested parties—in this case, the provinces—and its unilateral willingness to break, not an understanding, but a contract, with the government of a province.

This, of course, is all of a piece with the talk about reducing its contributions to long established federal-provincial shared-cost programs, which the federal government persuaded the provinces to get into many years ago—for instance, medicare and hospital insurance. Incidentally, the threatened reduction of federal contributions to these programs will certainly put at risk one of the main objects which it was alleged these programs were established to bring about, namely, a uniform standard of treatment for Canadians in all parts of Canada. This, too, is hardly a contribution to national unity.

The President of the Treasury Board appeared to think—and I suppose the government appears to think—that if the federal contribution to these programs is reduced, the total spending of governments at all levels will be reduced. I say, honourable senators, that this is surely a completely mistaken view of the situation, in view of what will happen. After all, the level of these programs, which people have long since become accustomed to, will have to be maintained by somebody, as far as it is possible for somebody to maintain them.

These services simply cannot be discontinued; it is not politically practicable to discontinue them. So, if the federal government pays less towards carrying them out, then other levels of government, and particularly provincial governments, will have to pay more, although it may be that some of those who are less well off will not be able to pay sufficiently more to prevent deterioration of the standard of service which they make available to their citizens.

In this connection the President of the Treasury Board said he is worried—and again I suppose it is true to say that the government is worried—about the portion of the gross national product taken up by government spending; that is, government spending at all levels. And well he might be, and so should we all, because, as he pointed out, the level of all government spending in relation to the gross national product in 1961 was 30.8 per cent, and 15 years later, in 1976, it had grown to 40.3 per cent, an increase of almost exactly one-third.

But, honourable senators, I say again that reducing federal transfer payments to the governments of the provinces will not help much, if it helps at all, to reduce the rate of increase in the proportion of the gross national product required to maintain these shared-cost programs which the people have long since come to accept as a necessary and essential part of life. If the federal government pays less then, I say again, the proportion of the total gross national product which will be required to maintain these services will not be lessened; the amount of the gross national product taken by the federal government may be lessened, but the amount of the gross national product taken by the provinces will have to be increased correspondingly. So it seems to me that there is no virtue whatever in the argument that reducing these transfers to the provinces for shared-cost services will assist in reducing the total burden of taxation coming out of the GNP.

Incidentally, in connection with spending, the President of the Treasury Board said that the rate of increase in federal spending in the current year will be about $9\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. That appears to be the government target, although I think he described it as the ceiling below which the increase in government spending would be kept. But he also said on the same occasion that the government cash requirement this year will be \$11.8 billion which, of course, appears to be at least the deficit. So whatever is the rate of increase in federal government spending, it is clearly more than the revenues will meet, and more than the revenues will meet by a very large amount. The total spending, as I pointed out, authorized so far in gross spending for the year is just barely under \$50 billion. And if there is a short-fall in revenues of \$11.8 billion, that amounts to well over 20 per cent of the total spending for the year, and much over 20 per cent of the total revenues for the year. So whatever the rate of spending, it is clearly more than the revenues will meet.

Another disturbing figure given by the President of the Treasury Board is that the cost of servicing the public debt this year will increase by about 23 per cent. If that rate of increase continues, and if my mathematics are correct, it means that in 3.2 years the cost of servicing the public debt will be twice as much as it is now, and in 6.4 years it will be four times as much as it is now. In the last fiscal year that cost was approximately $5.5 billion.

● (2040)

This brings me to the off-the-top-of-the-head alleged spending cuts announced by the Prime Minister last summer—$2 billion was the favourite figure. Since much of this would affect and concern the provinces, one would expect that the provinces would have been consulted before any such substantial cut, if it is a cut, was announced, and that the effect of that cut not only upon the provinces but upon the ability of the Government of Canada to carry out its commitments would have been carefully evaluated.

In this connection, and to indicate clearly how much evaluation there was, let me read a few lines from the telex which the Prime Minister sent to the premiers on August 18, 1978. On the third page thereof these words appear:

Within the expenditure cuts already announced, each one of the federal departments that are affected will examine the expenditures that have been reduced or eliminated—

And listen to this, honourable senators.

—in order to evaluate thoroughly the federal-provincial implications.

He is not telling them that the federal departments or anyone in the federal government evaluated thoroughly the federal-provincial implications before this announcement was made; he is saying that after the announcement is made, and after the government has been committed to the cuts, then, and only then, will each one of the federal departments affected examine the expenditures that have been reduced or eliminated in order to evaluate thoroughly the federal-provincial implications. After the horse has got away, the door will be locked. After the decision has been taken, somebody will try to find out what it is going to mean to people.

Clearly nobody in Ottawa knew how this decision would affect provincial plans, provincial budgets or provincial expenditures. It seems to me that this is a pretty complete self-condemnation of the care with which these announced cuts were considered, and of the care with which possible adverse effects upon provincial governments were considered or studied. No wonder, honourable senators, this government has trouble getting along with the provinces. In the light of all of its actions—and I have mentioned only a few—it is not easy to feel that this government really knows what it is doing in these fields.

I should like, however, to end on an encouraging note. The President of the Treasury Board says that the rate of increase in spending, which I mentioned as being $9\frac{1}{2}$ per cent for the current year, is less than the rate of increase in the gross national product which, he believes, will be in the order of $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent this year. Thus, the rate of spending this year—and I think this is true of last year—whatever it may be, is growing at a slower rate than the GNP is growing. That, of course, is a good thing. We, on this side of the house, have advocated that for a long time, and we are glad that for at least two years, and perhaps more—I did not ask if it went further back than two years—this objective has been met.

Honourable senators, I said I did not oppose the bill, and I do not. I also think there is no need for it to be referred to committee. Indeed, if my honourable friends opposite feel it reasonable to ask for leave to proceed to third reading tonight, it is possible that the house might consent.

Senator Flynn: There is no reply from the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Senator Smith (Colchester): In any event, honourable senators, I thank you for your courtesy and attention.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I am going to pay heed to the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that I should speak for only a few minutes. I will merely endeavour to supply Senator Smith (Colchester) with the information he sought concerning the item of $81 million having to do with the oil import compensation payments resulting from the federal government's announced intention to delay the scheduled January 1, 1979, increase in domestic oil prices and the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. This is all contained in one item.

I refer my honourable colleague to vote 10a on page 18 of Supplementary Estimates (A). The explanation of that vote is given on page 20, and it reads as follows:

Increased payments under the Oil Import Compensation Program . . . $81,000,000

The confusion apparently arises from the fact that there are two factors involved in this increase. First, there is the factor of the delaying of the scheduled January 1, 1979, increase, and, secondly, there is the factor of the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. This is all contained in one item under one department, and it is all included in vote 10a on page 18 of Supplementary Estimates (A).

This concludes my remarks. I commend this bill to the favourable consideration of honourable senators.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I see the figures in Supplementary Estimates (A) to which the Deputy Leader of the Government refers, but that does not satisfy my desire to know whether this amount of $81 million is really partly due to the oil payments and partly due to the devaluation of the dollar, or whether the oil payments are higher because of the devaluation of the dollar, and this is all lumped together in the amount of the oil payments rather than the devaluation of the dollar.

[Senator Smith.]

• (2050)

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, this is exactly what I meant when I gave the explanation. There is one result caused by two factors—the delay in the implementation of the January 1, 1979, increase, and, the devaluation of the dollar. This is all in connection with the oil import compensation program.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave, now.

Senator Flynn: I agree. The reply was so short that they deserve to have leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE SENATE

PRINTING ERRORS IN OFFICIAL RECORDS—QUESTION

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question having to do with the printing errors that appear almost daily in our official records. On Tuesday, December 5, I requested that an address that had been prepared by the late Senator Greene be printed as an appendix to Hansard of that date. That was done. In making that request I drew to the attention of the Senate the fact that on Thursday, October 19, the late Senator Greene had raised a question of privilege in the house about the misspelling of his name in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

Now, believe it or not, the Printing Bureau has done it again. The Printing Bureau misspelled the late senator's name in the heading of the appendix that I had asked to have printed. I specifically looked at the original text sent to the Printing Bureau, and in it Senator Greene's name was correctly spelled. Furthermore, while examining Hansard of that date rather minutely, I found 11 printing errors, including three in the appendix.

• (1410)

My question is: Is there any proofreading being done by the Printing Bureau, and, if so, what is the precise method, how can it be improved, and when will they get sighted people to do the proofreading?

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I noted that Senator Croll—

Senator Flynn: Order.

Senator Benidickson: —had asked that this be an appendix to our proceedings.

Senator Flynn: Order. Senator Croll asked a question, and I would like an answer from the Leader of the Government. If the honourable senator has a point of order, he can raise it a little later.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I suppose it may be safe to say that in matters such as this the Printing Bureau has the last word.

Senator Flynn: And the last laugh.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition said "the last laugh". This also may be correct. Honourable senators, may I say that an inquiry will go forward on this matter.

However, generally both the Printing Bureau and the Debates Reporting Branch operate extremely well under very trying circumstances at times, and if mistakes are made occasionally they are, perhaps, understandable and forgivable in the context of some of the activities that take place here.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I simply wanted to say that I believe we all appreciate Senator Croll's initiative the other day in having the speech of the late Senator Joe Greene printed as an appendix to our proceedings.

UNITED NATIONS

NAMIBIA—CANADIAN FORCES CONTINGENT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I take this opportunity to attempt to reply to a question asked by Senator Smith (Colchester) on December 6 regarding, as he said, "the country now known as Namibia and once known as Southwest Africa." The honourable senator asked:

Has the Government of Canada made a decision, either final or tentative, to provide a contingent of Canadian armed forces to any United Nations force that may be sent to that country in connection with the proposed United Nations elections?

Canada has not, as yet, received a request from the Secretary General of the United Nations for a contribution to a peacekeeping force in Namibia. The Security Council has approved a plan based on the proposal made by Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United Kingdom and the United States for a peaceful resolution of the Namibia problem.

It is the responsibility of the Secretary General of the United Nations to consult with all parties concerned in the composition of the UN force, on the date for its deployment to Namibia, and on the mandate that will govern its operation.

When the conditions and terms of reference are established, should a request come from the Secretary General for a contribution to a peacekeeping force in Namibia, the government will give it serious consideration to determine whether Canada can play a useful role.

Senator Flynn: That is a surprising answer.

TRANSPORT

REDUCED AIR FARES WITHIN CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government with respect to the reduced air fares that were instituted in Canada during this past season, some by way of charter and some by other arrangements, that provided Canadians with cheaper travel within Canada. My understanding is that it was highly successful, and, indeed, all the seats that were made available at those rates were taken up.

My question is based on my understanding that a proposal for 1979 is now being considered by the Canadian Transport Commission and the air carriers involved. I would like to ask the Leader of the Government whether the government is pressing, as I hope it is, for this service to be expanded so that Canadians will be encouraged to travel in Canada?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, with reference to Senator Olson's question, I am wondering, as a new senator, if there is any way by which we can mark historic occasions. Air Canada has become famous over the years for losing luggage between two points. Last Friday I was part of an historic occasion. They lost a piece of my luggage before the plane even took off—which it never did, by the way. They should be given an award for that distinction.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF POLITICAL SITUATION IN IRAN ON OIL IMPORTS TO EASTERN CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the unstable political situation in Iran, and in view of the fact that Canada relies very heavily on oil imports from that country for the refineries located in eastern Canada, can the Leader tell us if there has been any shortage of deliveries in the past couple of weeks?

Senator Perrault: Senator, no information of that kind has been brought to the attention of my office. However, inquiries will be made to determine whether any short-falls are occurring, or whether any short-falls are indicated.

TRANSPORTATION

REPORT OF MCKENZIE ROYAL COMMISSION ON BRITISH COLUMBIA RAILWAY—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I was asked a question on November 21, by Senator Austin, with respect to the recommended sale of the British Columbia Railway to Canadian National Railways.

The senator's question has now become hypothetical, in that the Premier of British Columbia publicly announced on November 23 last, two days after the senator's questions, that his government would not take action on any of the recommendations contained in the McKenzie commission's report.

THE LATE GOLDA MEIR

CANADA'S REPRESENTATIVES AT FUNERAL OF FORMER PRIME MINISTER OF ISRAEL—QUESTION

Senator Bonnell: May I direct a question to the Leader of the Government? A few days ago the world lost one of its international personages, Golda Meir. I notice that the Minister of National Defence is representing the government of Canada at her funeral. Is any member of the Senate representing Canada at that funeral?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have the complete list at my disposal. The office of the Leader of the Government in the Senate was not approached to nominate a representative at the late Golda Meir's funeral.

Senator Flynn: I was not approached either.

FUGITIVE OFFENDERS BILL

MOTION FOR THIRD READING

Senator McIlraith moved the third reading of Bill S-9, respecting fugitive offenders in Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, it will be recalled that this bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and the evidence taken before that committee is now printed and available. It is issue No. 2 of that committee's proceedings, dated Wednesday, December 6.

It will also be recalled that the report of that committee was adopted by the Senate on Monday night of this week. That report recommended three amendments, the first two of which simply changed the wording of the clauses dealing with the expression "part of the Commonwealth" so that it included St. Kitts and St. Lucia. They were rather technical amendments. The third amendment dropped the word "complaint" from one of the clauses of the bill. The correct usage of the courts is "warrant and information". The bill had in it the words "warrant, complaint or information", and the amendment simply dropped the word "complaint".

That report, as I said, was adopted on Monday night. Now, at the third reading stage, another matter arises. It will be recalled that when the bill was before us on second reading, and in committee, the question of the definition of an "offence of a political nature" was discussed. Clause 2, the interpretation clause of the bill, defines an "offence of a political character" in a negative way. It reads:

● (1420)

"offence of a political character" does not include

(a) the murder, kidnapping or other assault on or restriction of the liberty of any person who is an "internationally protected person" as defined in section 2 of the Criminal Code or who would be such a person if

(i) in the case of a person referred to in paragraph (a) of that definition, he were in a state other than the state in which he holds an office or position referred to in that paragraph, and

(ii) in the case of a member of a family referred to in paragraph (b) of that definition, he accompanied a person referred to in paragraph (a) of that definition to a state other than the state in which the person referred to in that paragraph (a) holds an office or position referred to in that paragraph (a)—

Paragraph (a), it will be noted, is not exactly a model of clarity of expression. Indeed, it is possible to argue that it excludes the protected persons as defined in the Criminal Code in certain circumstances. That argument may or may not be a valid one, but it is an argument that could be made on the wording as it appears.

Therefore, with the concurrence of the Senate, I shall ask my colleague, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, to move an amendment. Perhaps it would be useful if I read it so that honourable senators can have both versions before them at one place in the Debates of the Senate. The motion is that clause 2 of Bill S-9 be amended by striking out lines 21 to 40 on page 2 thereof and substituting the following therefor:

(a) the murder, kidnapping or other assault on or restriction of the liberty of

(i) a head of state, including any member of a collegial body performing the functions of a head of state under the constitution of the state concerned, a head of a government or a minister of foreign affairs, and

(ii) a person mentioned in paragraphs (b), (c) or (d) of the definition "internationally protected person" in section 2 of the Criminal Code in the circumstances described in those paragraphs,

I think that will be seen as a clearer expression of what that part of the definition means, and I hope it will be helpful.

I have nothing further to add at this stage, but I would ask the Leader of the Government to move the amendment so that it will be formally before the Senate.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that this bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:

Page 2, clause 2: Strike out lines 21 to 40 and substitute the following:

(a) the murder, kidnapping or other assault on or restriction of the liberty of

(i) a head of state, including any member of a collegial body performing the functions of a head of state under the constitution of the state concerned, a head of a government or a minister of foreign affairs, and

(ii) a person mentioned in paragraphs (b), (c) or (d) of the definition "internationally protected person" in section 2 of the Criminal Code in the circumstances described in those paragraphs,

Senator Flynn: Explain.

Senator Perrault: Basically this is a clerical amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that this bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, yesterday I had the occasion to discuss with Senator McIlraith a proposed amendment that he wanted to put forward today.

Is the simultaneous interpretation system working?

Senator McIlraith: Yes.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I did not have an opportunity to study the amendment before lunch time. You know, however, that we had raised this issue at second reading stage, as well as others which were more substantial than the technical amendment which is now proposed. Also, at the committee stage, my colleagues, Senator Smith, Senator Wagner, Senator Robichaud and others who attended the sittings of the committee, raised important questions regarding certain clarifications which we would like to see appearing in this bill in order to make it more comprehensive.

At the very outset, it had been said that the bill that we have before us is easy to understand and that it is not complicated. However, this is where one can point out the work of the opposition, for when the bill was put under scrutiny it appeared that it had important shortcomings which had to be corrected if it was to hold by itself, to mean what it purported to mean and to have the powers which it was meant to contain.

So for the reasons I have just stated, I would like to carry out a further study of the amendment and perhaps bring in others tomorrow since there are substantial questions which were not answered at the committee stage. I am naturally going to consult my colleagues who sat on that committee and who have raised some important questions. I therefore move that this debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Consideration of the Third Report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.—(Honourable Senator Forsey).

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, this particular report of the Standing—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Forsey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lafond, that this report be now adopted.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I apologize to Her Honour the Speaker and to the House for this lapse on my part—this solecism.

Senator Walker: Think nothing of it.

Senator Forsey: This is a rather novel report from the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. I don't think we have drawn attention to anything of this sort specifically in relation to a particular instrument before, because in this particular report we are recommending that Parliament should pass amending legislation—an amendment to the Aeronautics Act. The reason why we are recommending this is that under our criteria for examining the instruments—criteria adopted by both houses—we look into the legal basis, the vires, of instruments which come before us, and we also look at them to find out whether, even if the enabling power is apparently sufficient, there is what we consider an unexpected and unusual use of the power conferred by the statute. There is here what we consider an unexpected and unusual use of the power conferred by the statute.

● (1430)

In this particular instance, the vires of the regulation at issue appears to be somewhat doubtful, as even the department itself recognizes. It says that the regulation has never been challenged and, therefore, we have no precedent against which we can determine its validity. The committee did not raise in any substantive way the question of vires, but merely said that even if this regulation is intra vires, it constitutes an unusual and unexpected use of the power.

What the regulation purports to do is to give the minister power to empower some other person to enter upon lands adjacent to an airport to remove excessive natural growth. The reason why the department wants this is that it has had difficulty in getting people to conform with the regulations prohibiting excessive natural growth in the vicinity of airports. So it decided that it should have a regulation giving the minister power to empower someone else to enter upon the lands and remove the excessive natural growth.

This appeared to the committee to be undesirable from its point of view, however desirable from the point of view of the department itself. It was undesirable from the committee's point of view because it constitutes a case of subdelegation, which does not appear to be explicitly contemplated by the act, and embodies the rather questionable view that subdelegation is permitted, is proper, is legal, whenever you get one of these magic phrases like "respecting" or "in respect of."

Section 6(1) of the act says that the minister may make a direction, a regulation may empower the minister to make a direction in respect of any such matter coming within section 6(1) of the act as that regulation may prescribe. But here you have a pretty wide interpretation of that rather slippery phrase "in respect of", and you have a subdelegation. It seemed to the committee that the desirable object which the regulation had in view should be provided for by an explicit provision of the act which would make it possible to do this in accordance with power clearly given by the act.

The committee recognized that the action was useful and necessary, but it was following its general principle, which I have sometimes stated in the words of St. Paul, "Let all things be done decently and in order." It is not sufficient that something should be useful, practical; it is not sufficient that it meets a practical problem; it is not sufficient that it is administratively convenient. There is a tendency in some quarters, I find, among the officials to contend, in effect, that administrative convenience is a basic principle of our Constitution. The committee has had to take exception to this view on more than one occasion. This is not a very conspicuous example, but the problem is raised here. It could be put another way by saying that the committee regards it as one of its duties to point out to both houses of Parliament when there has been even slight apparent trespass upon the principle of the rule of law. If things are to be done there should be clear and emphatic and explicit words for them in the enabling legislation.

It is for that reason that in this report the committee recommends that the Parliament of Canada should take action to amend the Aeronautics Act so that there should be no doubt at all that the power which this regulation purports to confer is being exercised in accordance with the determined and determinate will of Parliament.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the First Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline.—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.).

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is my intention to stand this order, but in doing so I want to give a brief word of explanation. I intend to speak to this report on Tuesday or Wednesday of next week, but I hesitate to stand the order until that time. It may be that some other honourable senator, especially a member of the committee, may want to speak to it between now and then, and for that reason I propose that it stand one day at a time.

Order stands.

POST OFFICE

INCREASE IN POSTAL RATES BY REGULATION—INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

On the Inquiry of Senator Forsey:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the declared intention of the Government to effect the next increase in postal rates by Regulation under the Financial Administration Act rather than by an Act amending the Post Office Act.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might have leave to withdraw this inquiry. The subject matter of the inquiry will come up when the bill now before the other place to establish the Post Office as a crown corporation comes before us. Any observations that I could usefully make can be much more appropriately made, and much briefer, when that bill is before us. For that reason, I ask leave to withdraw the inquiry.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, December 14, 1978

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

YUKON TERRITORY

PRESENTATION OF SHIELD OF ARMS TO THE SENATE

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, with Christmas so near it seems appropriate for the people of the Yukon to present a gift to the Senate of Canada.

This shield, which bears the arms of the Yukon, was hand carved by Mr. Jim Simpson and painted by Mrs. Faye Deer, both of Whitehorse. Close examination will show the great care taken by Mr. Simpson and Mrs. Deer to ensure that our shield of arms has been accurately represented.

On behalf of all Yukoners, I take great pride in presenting the shield of arms of the Yukon Territory to Her Honour the Speaker, and I look forward to seeing it in its proper place with the other shields on the door of the Senate chamber.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know that I speak on behalf of all honourable senators when I thank Senator Lucier for the magnificent hand-carved shield of arms of the Yukon Territory which he has presented to the Senate. It will be affixed to the door of the Senate chamber, from which it has been absent for some considerable time—indeed, since the construction of this building. It is good to have it now.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I join the Leader of the Government in thanking Senator Lucier for his presentation of the shield of arms of the Yukon Territory. I think it coincides with the first general election that was held there, and I am sure that Senator Lucier is very happy with the result.

Senator Perrault: There is a little too much blue in the shield of arms.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, on a point of order, whenever an election is held in the Yukon and good people are elected, we are happy with the result.

Senator Perrault: Some elections are happier than others.

Senator Flynn: Others will come.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the National Film Board of Canada, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978, pursuant to section 20(2) of the National Film Act, Chapter N-7, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the National Harbours Board, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended December 31, 1977, pursuant to section 32 of the National Harbours Board Act, Chapter N-8, and sections 75(3) and 77(3) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, December 19, 1978, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to tell you, as well as I can at this time, how things look for next week.

It had been expected that the Senate would sit on Friday of this week and on Monday of next week to complete our work in time to adjourn for Christmas on Thursday, December 21. I am moving the adjournment until Tuesday evening because we have been informed that it is unlikely that any legislation will come to us before that day, and it is quite possible that we shall not be able to adjourn for Christmas on Thursday next. As honourable senators are well aware, the Unemployment Insurance bill has been delayed in the other place and it could very well be that it will not come to us until late next week.

Meetings of four committees are already scheduled for next week. On Tuesday the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution will meet at 10.30 a.m. and 2 p.m.; there will be an in camera meeting of the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline at 2 p.m.; and the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science will meet at 4 p.m. to continue its examination of the subject matter of Bill C-14, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has arranged a meeting for 9.30 a.m. on Wednesday next on Bill S-6, the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED MEETING BETWEEN CHIEFS FROM ATLANTIC PROVINCES AND FEDERAL MINISTERS—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

In view of the meeting that was held this morning by some members of the Senate, under the chairmanship of Senator Bonnell, in the course of which we met certain Indian chiefs from the Atlantic provinces, I would ask the chairman if he has been able to arrange a meeting of this group with either the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, or both.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, no arrangement has been made as yet, but I have been in touch with the ministers' offices. Both ministers were in cabinet this morning and had other commitments. A telephone number to contact the Indian chiefs was left with the ministers, and they are to try to contact the chiefs some time before 3.15 this afternoon.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say that I have offered my assistance in this matter. As you are aware, Thursday is the regular cabinet day and the ministers have been extremely busy with their cabinet responsibilities. The cabinet meeting was a long one. Furthermore, the Honourable Monique Bégin appeared before one of our Senate committees this morning, as well as attending to her responsibilities in cabinet.

Shortly before 2 o'clock I sent a personal memorandum to the minister expressing the hope that, if her schedule would permit it, this important meeting would take place. I hope something can be done.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTION FOR SMALL BUSINESSES—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Since the Minister of Finance brought down his recent budget, there has been a great deal of concern and uncertainty among small businesses in the service sector concerning the small business tax deduction. Is it the intention of the government to clarify what companies are specifically affected in order to clear up this uncertainty?

• (1410)

Senator Perrault: The matter is under intensive study and scrutiny at the present time.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

REQUIREMENT FOR DOMESTIC AIR CHARTER BOOKINGS—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government whether he is aware that another one of these unusual uses for the social insurance number has surfaced. The Canadian Transport Commission now requires that all domestic air charter passengers provide their social insurance number or other valid identification number if they wish to use the advanced booking system.

By what authority does the Canadian Transport Commission issue this mandatory regulation? Besides the social insurance number, what are the other valid identification numbers referred to in this request?

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Perrault: In view of the recent controversy surrounding this subject, the honourable senator has asked an important question and I will take it as notice. The full information is not available to me at this time. No Canadian wants to see a misuse of social insurance numbers. That information will be obtained.

Senator Roblin: Is the leader favourably disposed to consider recommending to his colleagues in the other place the introduction of legislation to establish guidelines and limitations upon the use of the social insurance number or other identification numbers in order to protect Canadians against threats to personal privacy?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I suggest that Senator Roblin, with his extensive background in government, may wish to formulate, in more specific fashion, his suggested recommendations. I would be very pleased to convey them to the appropriate minister and to determine whether the government may be prepared to move in the directions he proposes.

However, may I suggest to all senators that during the next few months this may well be a subject that should be debated in this chamber. A number of important issues facing this country could well be debated in the Senate. They range from defence policy to social insurance numbers, agricultural matters, matters relating to the aged and to the disabled in this country. There is a wide range of human issues upon which the Senate could make a great contribution to this country by having full debates.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am much encouraged by the leader's statement, and I will take under consideration the advisability of giving him the opportunity he refers to. I would be encouraged even more if he were to assure me that at the end of the debate we would not be inflicted with the whips with respect to the vote. Then we might carry a little more influence in the other place than I am liable to exercise by myself or even with my distinguished colleagues in this part of the house.

Senator Perrault: I think the honourable senators who serve in this place have indicated their willingness to bring independent judgment to bear on all important matters affecting this country.

Senator Flynn: I hope this is an appeal directed especially to the members of this place who support the government.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, may I ask the leader a supplementary question relating to the subject matter raised by Senator Roblin?

Is it correct that his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Honourable Mr. Cullen, is intending to set up some kind of study committee to look into the use of so-called SIN numbers? If so, could we have the terms of reference given to that committee and when it intends to begin work?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have Mr. Cullen's statement and reported commitment available to me at my desk this afternoon. However, it is my understanding that he has given that kind of commitment. I would hope that might form part of the reply which I intend to bring to the Senate just as soon as I am able to obtain it.

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, I understood the leader to say that he hoped sometime soon to make a statement about the use of social insurance numbers. Could the leader assure us that that statement will include an answer to the question I asked a couple of weeks ago? I do not think the specific information in response to my question has reached him yet. The purport of my question was whether or not the practice with respect to the use of the social insurance number in the armed services was introduced with the approval of the members of the armed services, either individually or collectively, or in consultation with them.

I wonder if that could be made part of the statement that the honourable leader hopes to make.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have the text of my reply to that question in front of me. This reply was given a number of days ago, and I cannot say at this moment whether there were lengthy discussions on the subject with the leaders of the armed forces. Inquiries will be instituted with respect to this matter.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government when I may expect to get answers to questions standing in my name on the order paper? Four of them have been on the order paper since October 31, which is six weeks ago, and seven have been there since November 20. Is there any reason these answers have not been forthcoming? They should be very simple questions to answer.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the preparation of replies to questions asked in this chamber by honourable senators, as in the case of questions asked in the other chamber by members of that place, often involve a great deal of research and work. At times it is simply impossible to provide the information within a week or two.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CEREMONIES TO MARK THIRTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF D-DAY—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Honourable Senator Marshall asked a question on November 21, approximately three weeks ago, and part of that question was as follows:

Last Friday in the other place the Minister of Veterans Affairs answered a question having to do with the thirty-fifth anniversary of D-Day next June. The minister indicated that plans were being made. Could the leader assure us that we will be apprised of any progress in that planning so that we will be aware of the very important ceremony that will take place next June?

I have contacted my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs and he has provided the following reply:

My response on November 17 was to the effect that I intend to lead a delegation to Normandy in June 1979 to mark the 35th anniversary of the D-Day landings. Officials of my department are currently formulating the plans for this pilgrimage and I will be announcing these plans in due course. However, I can assure you that, as in the past, I will invite participation from the Senate in this important function.

I trust this will be satisfactory.

THE SENATE

REFORM—SUGGESTIONS BY SENATORS—QUESTION

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, a few months ago the leader asked senators to communicate to him their ideas on the subject of Senate reform. I think all honourable senators wrote to him to state what they thought about the matter. I think it would be a good idea, while the Senate Committee on the Constitution is still alive, to have a breakdown of the recommendations put forward on this subject by the members of this chamber.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would be most pleased to discuss with the chairman of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution the views put forward by a number of senators on this subject. However, I can say in a general way that, despite one view held by certain people, the Senate is not zealously interested in preserving the status quo. Many senators have advanced some of the most progressive, constructive and useful ideas concerning the further improvement of this place as well as of Parliament generally.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SALE OF LABRADOR LINERBOARD MILL LTD.—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if any progress has been made with regard to the involvement of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the sale of Labrador Linerboard Mill Ltd., which is a very important issue in Newfoundland.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, constructive discussions and negotiations continue in a very heartening way.

MOTION FOR THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion in amendment of Senator Perrault to the motion of Senator McIlraith for the third reading of Bill S-9, respecting fugitive offenders in Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, it is not often that the Leader of the Government moves an amendment to a bill at the third reading stage. In my opinion, this shows that the committee has done an excellent job and worked efficiently since it convinced the Leader of the Government to consider the report and suggest amendments to the bill at the third reading stage.

I adjourned the debate yesterday because my colleagues and I wanted to have a closer look at the amendment moved by the Leader of the Government to determine whether we could accept it in its present form or whether we should make other suggestions.

Following discussions with Senator Wagner, we have concluded that we are not satisfied with the definition of "head of state" as contained in the amendment. For your information, I would like to read the definition contained in the amendment:

(a) the murder, kidnapping or other assault on or restriction of the liberty of

(i) a head of state, including any member of a collegial body performing the functions of a head of state under the constitution of the state concerned, a head of a government or a minister of foreign affairs

Senator Wagner noted that heads of state and ministers of foreign affairs are, of course, very prominent people, but that the other ministers and members of the cabinet are also important.

If the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who is a minister of state, went abroad and was kidnapped, this would not only be a great loss for the Senate, but I consider that it would be as important as if the Minister of Justice went on a visit to Africa and was kidnapped. I believe that the definition given here of a head of state, which includes the minister of foreign affairs, is not broad enough. We should add all cabinet members who travel abroad. I do not know how such an amendment could be worded, but I believe that the present text is too restrictive.

Senator McIlraith, with whom I discussed the matter yesterday and to whom I suggested that the definition was too restrictive, told me that the department followed one of a series of definitions given in the Criminal Code which also mentions the head of state and which says:

[English]

"internationally protected person" means

(a) a head of state, including any member of a collegial body performing the functions of a head of state under the constitution of the state concerned, a head of a government or a minister of foreign affairs, whenever such person is in a state other than the state in which he holds such position or office—

[Translation]

Of course, that definition was taken and applied as it stands. But since we are changing a law that is nearly one hundred years old, I am under the impression that the concept and the definition in the Criminal Code should be immediately broadened. I think it should also include all members or all ministers of a government going abroad who might come under an amendment that could be introduced by the Leader of the Government. That is my first point.

As to my second point, I do not have to tell you that personally I was somewhat disappointed that following the work of our committee there was agreement to let the minister keep the discretion that this legislation gives him with respect to the decisions of the courts. I said so on second reading. We discussed this in committee. I still think the minister, exercising his discretion following evidence laid before a court and a judgment made by that court, can under clause 18 say: "I am overruling the judgment of the court, and I am not returning to his country the fugitive or the person who was judged by a competent court to be persona non grata." Senator Smith argued in committee that such discretionary power was too absolute and, as it remains the prerogative of a single minister, it would be better for the Governor General in Council to be able in those exceptional cases to make the decision rather than leave it up to a single minister to overrule a decision of a court that considered the merits of the case.

My third point—of course, some might say that it is a repetition—is the change between Bills S-8 and S-9, a major change, as we suggested in committee, and the officials of the Department of Justice who appeared before the committee confirmed it. I do not accept the amendment made in S-9, particularly in clause 18, which says that, under the discretion I just spoke about, the minister may refuse to return the fugitive to his country if in that country he could be subject to a judgment or punishment excessively severe or inhumane for a returnable offence in respect of which his return is being requested. I find that extremely wide. I insisted in committee, as did my colleagues, on knowing what the minister could mean by "extremely excessive punishment." We asked whether there was a list of crimes that could be considered as extremely excessive punishment. Departmental officials told us that was not easy because of changing circumstances in different countries in which this extradition treaty will apply. We were told that it was difficult to give elaborate definitions of what constitutes extremely excessive punishment. I am under the impression that those punishments should have been listed to help the minister in the decisions he must make with respect to his discretionary, absolute power.

Honourable senators, those were the few comments I wanted to make following the amendment introduced by the Leader of the Government on third reading.

[English]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, if the sponsor of the bill does not want to reply to those observations, I think the matter raised by Senator Asselin is serious enough to warrant our referring the bill and this amendment to committee. There is no rush. This is a Senate bill. It was initiated here. It certainly cannot pass the other place before Christmas. It is possible that next week we will be able to spare an hour to look into this question. The point is well taken.

● (1430)

Senator McIlraith: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition which amendment he is speaking about? I am not quite clear.

Senator Flynn: The amendment proposed by the sponsor of the bill which, it appears, refers only to a minister of foreign affairs, and apparently would exclude other members of the government. I have not looked at all the definitions in the code, but when the amendment singles out a minister of foreign affairs it puts him on a superior footing. Why would not the other members of the government be included? Like Senator Asselin, I am speaking of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who is as precious as any other member of the administration.

Senator Perrault: Would I be ransomed?

Senator Flynn: They would probably get a higher ransom for him than for the present Minister of External Affairs. The question is serious enough. Since there is no rush about this bill, we should refer it back to committee in order that the amendment and its implications may be studied.

There is another point that might not be received as favourably by honourable senators, and that is whether the discretion not to extradite a person should be solely that of the minister or Governor in Council. Personally I could live with that, but perhaps the committee could look into that aspect again, if honourable senators think it necessary.

I would move, therefore, that the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to committee for consideration of the proposed amendment. I consider that the wisest course to follow.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, before replying to the question raised by the Leader of the Opposition, I should like to make some remarks which may have some bearing on part of what he said.

Senator Flynn: I was waiting for that, but you did not rise.

Senator McIlraith: The proposed amendment that is before us is, of course, not clearly understood. It follows the same procedure as that followed in situations involving diplomatic immunity. We are not dealing with that. Diplomatic immunity in other countries operates only in a certain limited way. It is very limited. It does not become applicable to all ministers of the Crown in our country, or to corresponding ministers in other countries. The definition here concerns a political offence, and it is not clear.

The wording of the definition we are concerned with deals in a negative way with those situations where there is alleged to be a political offence, which is described by reference to a definition in the Criminal Code. The definition is negative. It says that an offence of a political character does not include certain crimes, one of which is murder. The amendment is intended to make it clear that the murder of a head of state, and so on, cannot be alleged to be a political offence.

Senator Flynn: But that does not reply to my question.

Senator McIlraith: I realize that, and I am coming to it. I wanted to make the point, as far as I could. However, I may not have satisfied the point, and I am the first to recognize the deficiency in that argument. But, this amendment is designed to clarify the language used in the clause.

The Leader of the Opposition is now arguing that the bill should be referred back to committee for examination. Leaving aside that point for the moment and considering the other point raised by Senator Asselin, I see no need to refer the bill back to committee. In my view, the matter is not arguable. Perhaps there was a misunderstanding of my explanation in that I did not make it sufficiently clear why the discretion in clause 18 is necessary or desirable.

The situation is that the Fugitive Offenders Act applies to those countries within the Commonwealth which recognize the Queen as head of state. In practice it applies to 12 countries and territories. Those countries, because they are parliamentary democracies, follow the rule of law, and have a standard of law that we understand. They are akin to us. This bill brings all members of the Commonwealth into its orbit. There are more than 70 countries and protectorates in the Commonwealth, and a wide range of forms of government. From the point of view of standards, some forms of government are totally foreign to us.

Senator Flynn: Name one.

Senator McIlraith: I have thought about that. There is one that I have in mind.

Senator Flynn: So have I.

Senator McIlraith: In fact, there are several that I have in mind, the government of each being under the control of one man, whatever his title might be. I have read the constitutions of some of those countries, and to a Canadian's way of thinking they are shocking documents. In any event, in those countries one man has absolute power, and it includes the power to make laws in a way that is totally foreign to us. He has absolute power over individuals. Knowing that, and knowing that the same situation obtains in some other countries which come under the Extradition Act, where governments change very rapidly, literally overnight, and sometimes with violence, and where action is sometimes taken in an arbitrary way which is beyond our comprehension, surely some kind of discretion is needed.

The difficulty about putting the discretion in the courts, where a more limited discretion exists now under the present Extradition Act, is that there is no way of getting information from the courts or governments of such countries, as the case might be, that would constitute the kind of evidence we would need if we were going to put the discretion in the court. Distasteful as it may be to give a minister the discretion, as a general principle, I can see no way of avoiding that.

If any honourable senator can suggest another way of approaching this problem, I would be glad to hear it. I certainly have not been able to come up with one, nor have I been able to obtain any suggestions along these lines, in the discussions I have had with them, from the officials who actually work with these problems. I have been perfectly frank with the Senate, I think, in voicing my own views on the question of ministerial discretion, but I see no way of avoiding it. The facts of the world situation as it exists today are such that honourable senators, surely, could not leave a Canadian citizen who happens to be in a foreign country, or a foreign citizen who happens to be in Canada, in a situation in which there is no arbitrary power beyond the remedies that must be supported by evidence produced in court, and which may result in either one being prevented from being returned to his own country.

That is the whole case on that point, and I hope that honourable senators will not ask that the bill be sent back to committee on that aspect of the matter.

With regard to this precise question of referring the amendment that is now before the house to committee, I wonder if honourable senators would agree to leave this matter open until Tuesday night, and let me continue my remarks on it at that time.

I gather that Senator Smith (Colchester) has a question. If so, I shall be glad to try to answer it.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I congratulate the senator on his powers of observation. I did not know it was so obvious that I wanted to say something, but I thank him for his invitation.

It may be—and this is not meant in any unpleasant way at all—that the argument he puts forward for not leaving this matter to a court carries a good deal of weight, but that is not really the point that some of us are arguing. We were saying that matters of this kind, which are of such vital importance to an individual in connection with his human rights—and his legal rights, too, for that matter—ought not to be left to the unfettered discretion of the minister. At least, it ought to be a matter for the Governor in Council to deal with.

Incidentally, I was present when the committee was considering this bill, and although I do not have the proceedings before me, as I should have, my recollection is that on this point the only argument was that there might be quite a lot of such cases, and that it would not be convenient to have them go to the Governor in Council. Those are not the exact words, of course, but that was the sense that I got from the reply by the officials to questions that were asked of them on this very point.

Once one abandons, for good reasons, the idea of confining discretion to a court, then surely one has more than a single choice after that when it comes to finding a place where the discretion should be lodged. The argument, just to repeat it, is that there is no reason why it should not be given to the Governor in Council, so as to afford as much protection as possible to the individual whose legal and human rights are being considered and determined, rather than be placed in the hands of the minister.

Senator McIlraith: I am quite willing to look further at that point, but there is one thing the honourable senator is missing. He has forgotten the basic element in our whole system of government, which is that the discretion granted to a minister is subject to the answerability of the minister to the elected representatives of the people in the House of Commons. That is a very good and important check on the exercise of such discretion by a minister. Regrettably, I had to leave the committee meeting early, but that point was omitted when the matter was under discussion there. It is an important point, and it is an important check when it is individual human freedoms, or whatever you call the subject matter of the discretion in this case, that are being dealt with.

I shall look at this point again, but I am not certain that an order in council adds anything. It would be possible to argue—although I will not advance the argument—that taking the discretion away from the minister may dilute the responsibility and the exercise of it. I will leave it at that. I do not advance that argument, as I say, but certainly it is worthy of note.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I thank the honourable senator. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I do assure him that not for one moment did I forget that the minister has to account to the elected representatives of the people. In my view, however, that is not enough in the circumstances, and really, while I recognize that the honourable senator puts that argument forward in the utmost good faith, I do not think I would find it difficult to point to quite a number of instances of the exercise of discretion by ministers within recent memory that I would not consider sufficiently checked or restrained by the fact that they had to account to the elected representatives of the people.

On motion of Senator McIlraith, debate adjourned.

STATUTE LAW (METRIC CONVERSION) AMENDMENT BILL, 1978

THIRD READING

Senator Langlois moved the third reading of Bill S-10, to facilitate conversion to the metric system of measurement.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE CONSTITUTION

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the First Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution.—(Honourable Senator Lang).

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, Senator Lang has agreed to my proceeding in his place this afternoon, with the consent of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I have a few remarks to make on the Canadian Constitution and the report of the special committee, and I begin with an apology for their length. I can only say in my defence that there are others I wish to address besides the honourable senators in this chamber, and I feel that I must speak in some detail in order to make my points clear to those outside this chamber.

I would like to begin with an illustrative story. Peter Peterson, once a senior economic official of the United States government, and now a partner in a Wall Street investment firm, knows a good deal about Canada and, while speaking to a dinner meeting of the International Chamber of Commerce last year, he told this story about us to that distinguished audience. Canada once thought it had everything going for it. The Canadians believed that they could combine the benefits of American efficiency, French culture and the British system of government, but things turned out differently; they ended up with American culture, the French system of government and British efficiency.

No doubt this was amusing to the audience, but for me the story bites, because it suggests the image of a nation which is in danger of having its future behind it. Where once we were universally admired for our skills in combining economic growth and social justice, we are questioned about our economic competitiveness and our sense of national purpose. Where once the label "Canadian" stood for leadership in many areas of international economic and social development, we now have the image of a quarrelsome and complaining people who have turned inward upon their own affairs and have lost their momentum.

In October, I attended a conference in Thailand called "Williamsburg VIII", sponsored by the Rockefeller Foundation. It was on economic and cultural affairs affecting South-East Asia and the Pacific Basin. At the beginning of the session, a home-country report was given by someone from each country represented there. As I was the only Canadian, the lot fell on me to talk for a few minutes about Canada. I thought I told a good story. But, the questions that came to me had a tone that was either apologetic, hesitating, or downright sceptical. Whatever the tone, the essence of the questioning was, "What's happening in Canada? We do not understand how such a prosperous, educated, politically-free country can be doing itself so much damage. Why are so many Canadians so unhappy about their country?"

Canadians think they can quarrel in the family and no one outside the national house will hear them. We think that when we go out into the world everything will be as before. That just is not true. By our internal divisions, we are affecting in a major way foreign investment confidence in ourselves. Just look at the performance of the Canadian dollar in world money markets. Our credibility in sales and marketing abroad is affected by these uncertainties at home. If an American and a Canadian product are competitive in price and condition, the foreign buyer will often take the U.S. product because the Americans seem to be more reliable, and there is political and economic security in the transaction. Why take a risk on the quarrelsome Canadians?

Can there be anything more simple or more profound than that the world does not owe us a living? We have to make that living on our own. Increasingly, the problem is that by our inwardness and preoccupation we are not attending well enough to a changing, competitive world. We are missing the confident, competitive, flexible and dynamic edge we used to have and for which we were admired. We have to get it back.

It is not a question of whether Canadians have the ability. Of course we have. The question is whether we can find and assert a collective will to stay in the world as a full and contributing member. I abhor the remark one former U.S. friend made to me in jest when, trying to be funny, he told me, "At the rate you are going, Canada—or what's left of it after Quebec and Alberta separate de facto, if not de jure—will become famous as the 'sick man of North America'."

I say to honourable senators that those who assert that the debate on national unity and on our constitutional nature is sterile and useless, or not worth paying attention to, could not be more tragically wrong. However it started, or whatever its rational validity, the truth of the matter is that our energies, our talents, our purposes are preoccupied.

In time, by not attending to the tasks of a competitive world, we will self-destruct. Therefore, let us all turn to the task of national unity with a will, with an urgency, and with a sense of national purpose and reconciliation. We are a nation born of the compromise of absolutes. We know, and we have always known, that when views are firmly held in opposition to one another it is better to be patient, to be cool-headed and to be tolerant. It is better because the alternative is unthinkable in Canada.

To renew ourselves, we must employ again those old skills of compromise and work a new national will to join as a nation for the tasks the world now challenges us with.

It is impossible for any of us, as individuals, to deal comprehensively with all of the main subjects of the national unity debate. The report of the special committee presented on October 19 and Senator Stanbury's address to this chamber on October 25 make an excellent framework within which to proceed. Indeed, I have not seen anywhere a more responsible or aggressive attempt to deal with the issues raised in the government's white paper or in Bill C-60. Within this framework, and on this particular occasion, I intend to mention my concern with three major aspects of the constitutional debate.

What is most remarkable in the present debate about the nature and the role of the Senate is the nearly total ignorance of us which exists in the other place, the press and therefore, naturally, the general public.

If it were only ignorance, we could quickly repair the matter by pointing out what I believe to be a highly creditable record of public service. Unfortunately, ignorance is coupled with indifference and even hostility. Why is this the case? I do not believe we can deal intelligently with the role of the Senate unless we directly address ourselves to this question at the beginning.

I have had many opportunities, since being appointed to the Senate, to discuss our image with all manner of people. Very few Canadians know what we do. For many the impression is that we do nothing. By itself this comment could be met and turned aside on its lack of merit. We have been of significant use in our analysis of legislation, our committee work on policy, on government administration and many other factors I will mention. Those of the public and of the civil service who have appeared before us will and do bear us good witness.

Some Canadians hearing my comments about the Senate are interested; a few are even impressed. I am asked, "Why do we not have more sources of information? Why do we hear only criticism and never the sort of things you are saying?"

I have thought about these questions quite a lot. There exists in Canada an attitude of hostility toward us, based on what is perceived to be our non-democratic, privileged status. There exists in elements of the press, the academic community and even within the ranks of political parties represented here and in the other place, an attitude of antagonism towards second chambers in general.

Stanley Knowles, with his bills presented annually in the other place to abolish the Senate, typifies a century-old radical socialist bias. I am not certain what is in his mind. Chief Justice Hawke of the old Equity Court of England said, hundreds of years ago, "The devil himself knoweth not the mind of man." I do not pretend to know what is in the mind of Stanley Knowles, but my surmise is that Mr. Knowles carries in his head an ancient suspicion that non-elected chambers are a bastion for the protection of the privileged, and that a second chamber would only serve to frustrate the exercise of the will of socialism should his party ever be so fortunate as to capture power in the lower house.

No doubt, in earlier times, a second chamber was a manifestation of a conservative philosophy requiring an institutional check upon democracy and, in particular, the possibility of excesses of enthusiasm by an electorate thought to be not quite aware of the responsibilities of power. However, we are decades past any such belief about the electorate in Canada, and, indeed, the greatest criticism of the Senate to be heard nowadays is that as we do not ever act in restraint of the lower house, and, therefore, do not perform our proper function, we can safely be removed.

What Stanley Knowles and others who stand with him have failed to notice is that the role of the Senate has evolved. Today the Senate is not primarily a check on the will of the people as expressed in the other place, nor should it be if that will is expressed in a responsible, tolerant, fair and democratic way. Where both chambers are acting reasonably, the will of the lower chamber should prevail. We have long recognized that principle in our practice.

I submit that our primary function today is to act as a check on a lower house dominated by the executive. In other words, our legislative role and purpose is to defend the nation against an arbitrary executive which, through party discipline, has captured the free will of the government's supporters. All who think about governmental process know it could happen, so, in fact, we exist to protect one of Stanley Knowles' most strongly held principles—the protection of the people against the will of an arbitrary executive. No doubt Mr. Knowles will be grateful to have me point this out.

In 1917, when the power of the executive was not so well developed as it has become today, Sir Clifford Sifton wrote:

It must also be remembered that, under our system, the power of the Cabinet tends to grow at the expense of the House of Commons... The Senate is not so much a check on the House of Commons as it is upon the Cabinet, and there can be no doubt that its influence in this respect is salutary.

Perhaps Stanley Knowles looks upon the argument as a camouflage under which philosophical conservatives may fight the social achievements of government or prevent the use of power by a socialist government if elected? There is no argument that convinces everyone, but I cannot leave this discussion without quoting the late R. H. S. Crossman, a leading British Labour Party intellectual and cabinet member who wrote:

The growth of a vast, centralized state bureaucracy constitutes a grave potential threat to social democracy. The Socialist must be courageous enough to admit that the evils of oligopoly are not limited to the private sector... The idea that we are being disloyal to our socialist principles if we defend the individual against its incipient despotism is a fallacy.

There are other justifications for a second chamber, and they are so obvious that I offer them here with apologies. At the most elementary level there is what the philosophers call "a universal desire for a multitude of counsellors." There is the common sense or wisdom of going slowly in matters of principle and of thinking twice before a decision is made. These elementary concepts were manifest in the councils of the city states of Greece, the Senate of Rome and the councils of the German tribes, all of whom developed political insights which in theoretical terms, at least, we have not much improved on. One writer tells of the Germans:

● (1500)

Their ancient... governments had all of them a wise custom of debating everything of importance to their state, twice; that is, once drunk, and once sober; drunk—that their councils might not want vigour; and sober—that they might not want discretion.

As we are known as the body of "sober second thought" it is easy to conclude where we fit in that description.

Senator Flynn: Would you rather change to the other role?

Senator Austin: Not at all.

I have great difficulty in understanding Stanley Knowles when he argues that a second chamber is not necessary in a federal state, for that is the implication of his bills. Most of the thrust of proposals for Senate reform, including Bill C-60, and the Conservative Party's notion of a House of the Provinces, as well as of academic writings—

Senator Flynn: That is unfair. It was only a working paper.

Senator Austin: All right, some of those in the Conservative Party who have a notion of a House of the Provinces accept that in a country geographically as large as Canada with its population widely distributed, but concentrated in two of its regions, no chamber elected on the basis of population alone can adequately find a balance between the popular will of the majority on the one hand, and the needs of those whose regional experience is different from the majority on the other. In the popularly elected chamber, the will of the majority must be followed, but it is a will which at times can be expressed in the form of a tyranny of the minority.

How is the minority to be protected? The universal answer has been by a house of the regions, however formed, and in its very essence a second chamber exists to defer temporarily the will of the majority where a substantial minority is affected, or an important change in constitutional principle, whether public or private in nature, is proposed. Yet, Stanley Knowles, for all his undoubted and sincere devotion to the oppressed, the minorities and human rights, and to the questioning of every exercise of authority, seems to have no doubt that the lower house can never err, that the executive need never be checked.

Perhaps there has never been a more thorough debate about a constitution and the nature of the legislative and executive branches than that which took place in the United States at the end of the eighteenth century. The "Federalist" papers make fascinating reading for any who are seriously interested in these questions, and it would be hard to make a better justification for a second chamber than is found there. These were documents well known and considered by the Fathers of Confederation before their work was completed in 1867. Indeed, Sir John A. Macdonald was reportedly fond of quoting George Washington's famous simile that the Senate was a saucer to cool the legislation that was poured into it.

The Fathers of Confederation adopted a concept of checks and balances found in the United States Constitution, in turn based on the philosophic work of Montesquieu, in order to have restraint of the lower house and the executive, but also because that system expressed in regional terms within the federal state some opportunity to guarantee and protect the interests of the political units which previously had some autonomy.

Professor K. C. Wheare has expressed his conclusions about such debates by saying that:

There was a constant fear that the general executive and legislature, depending primarily on numbers, may adopt policies in foreign and domestic affairs, which might be opposed but ineffectually opposed by the less populous areas which are less strongly represented in the lower house.

Honourable senators, the same considerations have led to second chambers in which the regions or other political units are represented in all of the geographically large democratic states, including the United States, Australia, India and Germany.

Aside from acting as a check on the executive, and as a representative of regions and minority interests, the second chamber has a third major function which is vital in a constitutional democracy such as Canada. Life is growing more and more complex and the days of the encyclopedic man are over—with the exception of our friend, the Leader of the Opposition. The lower house simply does not have the time, or often the expertise, to deal in detail with everything before it. We have often seen badly drafted legislation, sometimes unworkable legislation, but legislation which is sound in principle. If we had not, perhaps Stanley Knowles would convince me a second chamber was redundant.

In my judgment, the technical assistance of a second chamber is undoubted. How can the lower chamber deal adequately with a large body of governmental and private experts? They have existing political work to do in the expression of the public will, often diversely interpreted, and in testing the strength, resolve and purpose of the government of the day. The second chamber's review of policy and technique is a significant alleviation of the burden of the lower chamber, which must be a forum for political discussion at the national level. John Stuart Mill said it best in his work, "Representative Government":

—if one House represents popular feeling, the other should represent personal merit, tested and guaranteed by actual public service, and fortified by practical experience. If one is the people's Chamber, the other should be the chamber of statesmen; and council composed of . . . men who have passed through important political office or employment.

In fact, he advocated an appointed Senate!

Now, honourable senators, I have done the best I can with the question of the justification for a second chamber. I turn to my next topic, to ask the further question posed in Bill C-60, discussed in the committee's report and canvassed by us all: How should this chamber be constituted and how appointed?

Let me explain my next remarks by telling you a short story. One philosopher was curious about a colleague because no matter what he asked he always got a question in reply. One day he said, "Colleague, how is it that whenever I ask you a question you always answer with a question?" "Why not?" was the reply.

The answer to my question is another question—A second chamber for what kind of society? The Senate, whatever its reform, must be, and must be seen to be, relevant, useful and responsive to the national community. Each of us has his own window on Canada. We see and understand Canada in shades of difference. Our political leaders have recognized this difference and told Canadians through the years that our cultural diversity was a strength, not a weakness, that our geographic diversity was a strength, not a weakness, so long as we kept our political unity and shared in a fair way the economic benefits of our nation. This has always been the formula for a national success story. It cannot be varied without great harm to this country.

Today there are strong forces at work seeking to weaken our political unity, and in the case of the Parti Quebecois, to destroy it. These forces are real, persistent and dangerous. They are based on pessimism, negativism and parochialism. If allowed to succeed, they will undermine the political and economic well-being of us all.

However, not all the forces of regionalism are negative and destructive. Some are beneficial, seeking chiefly to express in a better way the needs of Canadians living in various places in Canada, and asking for new and more adequate forms through which to express and satisfy those needs. Canadians, particularly in roles of leadership at the political level, must have the wit and the skill to capture those positive regional forces in a way that can reinforce Confederation and the commitment of Canadians everywhere to our national unity.

The grasp of this basic concept within the provisions of Bill C-60 affecting the Senate is, to my mind, fundamentally sound. I hasten to say, before I am misunderstood, that I have many objections to the House of the Federation as described in Bill C-60, but I emphasize my conviction that the sponsors of Bill C-60 have correctly and intelligently understood the problem that has to be dealt with. The positive forces of regionalism cannot and should not be opposed. To do so would be to damage Canada.

The positive forces of regionalism must be harnessed in a form which constitutionally expresses our political unity. My regret is that I cannot follow the drafters of Bill C-60 in their conclusion about implementation of their central theme. The central theme of Bill C-60 as it affects the Senate is to bring regionalism, as it is expressed through the provinces, back into the federal process so as to return Ottawa to its place as an effective clearing-house for the political demands and trade-offs of our nation. If this cannot be achieved, then the drafters of Bill C-60 believe, as I believe, that decentralization will continue to gain support and ultimately the ties that bind this country will come loose. It will then be each entity on its own, and the devil take the rest.

The drafters of Bill C-60 saw the Senate as the central place for the expression of that positive Canadian regionalism. I think they were candid enough to admit that, if we did not think it would work in the way they conceived, they would be glad to have our suggestions. I am certain that in the work of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution, and its forthcoming report, the government will have a practical foundation for making changes in the Senate which will greatly improve the ability of this chamber to do its public business and to express much more effectively its regional responsibilities.

As I have said, the Senate was created to express regional interests within our Confederation. At Confederation the smaller provinces proportionally were given a much greater representation in the Senate than in the lower house. Quebec conceded representation by population in the House of Commons, quite a step forward from the stalemate of the Province of Canada, but in turn was given explicitly an equality of representation in the Senate with Ontario. George Brown, speaking in the Confederation debates stated:

Our Lower Canada friends have agreed to give us representation by population in the Lower House, on the express condition that they shall have equality in the Upper House. On no other condition would we have advanced a step.

I have spent some time in looking at the basic arrangement that we know as Confederation. If the British North America Act is a part of our Constitution—and it is—and if our Constitution is to be interpreted in the light of the checks and balances established by the Confederation debates, then I cannot see how the Senate can be fundamentally changed by the legislative will of Parliament alone.

Of course, appointment, retirement and tenure can be changed by the will of Parliament, but not so as to frustrate the ability of the Senate to carry out its assigned constitutional role. Additionally, the legislative powers assigned to the Senate in the BNA Act were seen as necessary to the bargain or regional representation. I harbour serious doubts that constitutionally the Senate, by Parliament alone, could be rendered less able to act effectively.

The Supreme Court of Canada has before it perhaps the most fundamental of constitutional questions it has ever been called upon to deal with. Its decision will go to the very nature of our national political balance. Notwithstanding what the Supreme Court of Canada may say or do, both this debate and the report of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution call on us to look at the merits of the changes proposed by Bill C-60. I want to focus on the issue of how best to constitute this upper chamber.

As we stand today, we are what various writers and some of our distinguished predecessors in this chamber have called a "political judiciary". We have used the analogy of judicial appointment by the elected government of the day. As judges must be protected from, and be independent of, the will of the executive in order to produce justice between subject and subject, and equally between subject and the state, so must an upper chamber be free to consider its responsibilities to the regions, to minorities and to the constitutional framework of our nation. This thesis argues that if it is the responsibility of the upper chamber to defend the nation from the will of a capricious executive which controls a tame lower house, then the members of the upper chamber must themselves be protected from, and independent of, the will of the executive. The cornerstone of this system is the inability of the executive to remove those whom it does not favour.

Honourable senators, I do not feel I need go on at length in describing the present theoretical basis for the Senate, although there is much more that could be, and needs to be, explained to the public. Accepting the compelling quality of the argument, the problem has been that the Senate has not appeared so effective in practice. We are asked such questions as: When has the executive been capricious? When have you defended regional interests or spoken for the minorities? When have you acted independently? We have the answers but, as I have said previously, we have not made them plain.

Let me point to the case of a high public servant, about to be dismissed by legislation, who was not offered a parliamentary hearing in the other place. Let me point to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and its superb study of Kent County, New Brunswick, or the work of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty and its leadership in espousing the cause of low income groups. Let me point to the work of the Senate in dealing with the Maritime Code, or with bankruptcy legislation, or with the bill for the protection of borrowers and depositors.

To act independently is not synonymous with acting noisily or outrageously or in a confrontational way. We have, time after time, been more interested in results than in publicity, but that has kept our good deeds from the awareness of the people, while leaving our imperfections to stand by themselves.

There have been other criticisms of our format. Some say the term of office is too long or that there are many who do not perform a real public service—perhaps through illness, but not always—or that appointments are too much the patronage of the Prime Minister, or that there is not enough representation here from the provincial level of national experience.

Tenure is a question I do not propose to resolve even to my own satisfaction in this speech, but the essence of one answer to that problem is in allowing or even encouraging a form of retirement for those who are past good full-time service, perhaps along the lines of judicial retirement. In regard to appointments, I believe the Prime Minister has done an outstanding job of adding experience, ability and youth to both sides of this chamber. We may want a different method of appointment, but let us not fool ourselves that it will necessarily bring better people here. Without excluding anyone, I hope that any new system of choosing will also bring to the upper chamber men with the ability and experience of, say, the Honourable Jean Marchand and the Honourable Bud Olson on the government side, or the Honourable G. I. Smith and the Honourable Duff Roblin on the opposition side, to name only some of the Prime Minister's recent excellent appointments.

Honourable senators, we come from every part of the country and from many walks of life. We have, among our present membership of about ninety, some six former premiers, several former provincial opposition leaders, many more who were members of provincial legislatures, some who were mayors or reeves—all of whom form a total of about a third of our present membership.

Yet Bill C-60, as well as the report of the Joint Committee on the Constitution in 1972, argues that we are not composed in a way that best represents regional interests. They seek to repair this supposed defect by allowing the provinces access to the appointment procedure, either by allowing premiers to make some or all appointments or to make up lists from which the Prime Minister might select, or by some other form of federal-provincial consultation. Bill C-60 proposes that senators be chosen by Parliament and by the respective provincial legislatures, on the basis of the popular vote in the immediate preceding federal or respective provincial election, as the case may be.

Well, if any one of these proposals would result in stilling the acrimony of the federal-provincial debate and achieving the conceptual objective of Bill C-60 to make the federal system effective in accommodating regionalism, I would be for it. However, it is clear that the premiers will not play. With the sole exception of British Columbia, they see no advantage to their emerging aspirations in the confines of a new legislative role within the federal system. The majority vastly prefer the negotiating game of federal-provincial conferences to the legislative game of a reorganized House of the Federation where their individual power may be limited.

Frankly, I am relieved in a way that may be different from what many of you think. The rejection of Bill C-60 by the provinces does not let us off the hook of considering a more effective way to constitute a more viable upper chamber. It does allow us now to look at ways of doing so entirely within the federal process. Therein lies my sense of relief, for I found it difficult and distasteful to conceive of an effective, strong and nationally representative federal system where the provinces would be encouraged to debate and focus on their sectional political interests and with little likelihood, in fact I think none, of carrying on any of the other essential functions of an upper chamber. Provinces would in their nature come here to make deals, and not to act as constitutional guardians of the national interest.

I feel that, in practice, Bill C-60 might well have led to unrealizable provincial expectations, followed by their rejection not only of the new institutional role but of the federal system as we know it. The Bill C-60 system in relation to the upper house seemed to me to have a high risk exposure.

Yet the core idea of Bill C-60, to restore the legitimacy of our central institutions, as the national brokerage of regional and national interests, remains as valid and essential as ever. That being the case, I would like to propose, for consideration by the Senate committee, a system for incorporating positive regional forces within the Senate that is also entirely within the federal process. It takes essential elements of Bill C-60, and even of the ideas of the opposition parties, and rolls them into a method of selecting senators that I believe would give this chamber a more effective mandate to carry out the role of a second chamber as I have described it. It does not threaten or propose to change the present format of federal-provincial relations, but I believe it would greatly enhance the federal credibility in the nation.

• (1520)

Simply, I propose, first, that the Prime Minister, and each of the leaders of the officially recognized national parties represented in the other place, issue on or before the closing date for the nomination of members of Parliament for election to the House of Commons a list of names, in order of priority, of those designated as candidates for indirect proportional election to the Senate. This party list thus would be well known to the public at the time of the holding of the federal election.

Second, as the federal voter casts his or her ballot for election of a member to the House of Commons, that voter will also cast a separate party ballot indicating a popular vote for the Senate list. Each of the parties will thus win seats in the Senate based on their popularity with the voters. Thus, if in British Columbia we had 10 senators—and I agree with the Premier of British Columbia in his recommendation for a larger British Columbia representation here—and the parties got 45 per cent, 35 per cent and 30 per cent respectively, then in priority the first party would have elected the first four on its list, the second party the first three and the third party the first three.

Third, the necessary independence of senators from the executive would be ensured by traditional voting patterns which indicate that rarely would the Senate have a majority of senators from one party. Many governments have received less than 50 per cent of the popular ballot, but they have still won a majority in the House of Commons. In addition, however, it could be stipulated that each senator so elected had the right to be given at least the same priority place on the list for all and any federal election which may occur in a period of, say, 10 years from the election which brought the senator to office.

Some words of explanation are called for—perhaps many words, in the view of some honourable senators.

First, this proposal would recognize that a provincial government is elected primarily to manage the affairs of a province, that the member of the Commons is elected to represent his immediate constituency in the federal process, and that the senator elected from his entire province is the representative of the regional interests that chose him.

Second, the mandate of the senator to represent those regional interests would be enlarged by virtue of his or her being chosen by a group of politically like-minded voters. The premiers would have a competitively significant institution, claiming to speak for the people of the province.

Third, as the list is chosen by the national party leader for each province—and wise choice would indicate wide consultation before the list was made final—the party leader could select outstanding people in the respective regions to represent those regions. I do not see any difference in this proposal from our past practice. The selection might enhance the election chances of the members of Parliament. If a vacancy occurred in the Senate during a Parliament, I would leave it to the Prime Minister of the day to fill it by appointment.

Fourth, Bill C-60 proposes more ministerial appointments in the Senate and the appearance of ministers in either chamber. I find this most desirable. However, I would allow confidence motions only in the House of Commons. For my part, the directly elected chamber must remain the paramount centre of responsibility to the people of Canada. For that reason, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition must always sit in the House of Commons.

[Senator Austin.]

Fifth, and finally, in this description, I would add that perhaps the legislative power of this upper chamber should be reduced, and perhaps not. I am attracted to the idea that appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada and to key federal boards and agencies should be confirmed by the Senate. The present government recognizes the need to add regional credibility to these appointments so that they can withstand the assaults of premiers with other objectives in mind.

Honourable senators, I believe there are many constructive changes that can be made to the "independent judiciary" theory of the role of the Senate. I would be quite happy if we went on under the present system of appointment, or a modified form of it, because I think we could serve the people. Or we could use the system of election of the judiciary which I have outlined. After all, the initial election of judges in the United States has been, for the most part, a satisfactory system, and one which has preserved their democracy. One of my great judicial heroes, Mr. Justice Benjamin Cardozo, first came to the bench that way. As I have said, I believe the proposal to have merit and I commend it to the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution for serious consideration.

Honourable senators, I beg your indulgence for five minutes more. I would like to speak briefly about the role of the deputy minister in our constitutional practice. This is a role with which I have some considerable familiarity, and I believe that amendment and a renewed understanding of the responsibilities of a deputy minister are necessary.

No proper overview of government in Canada can be given without making some comment on the role played in our public affairs by the senior ranks of our Public Service. Their influence is pervasive in so many ways, as managers of fact gathering and of programs, as analysts of both policy and process, as champions of this or that value judgment, in advising on and influencing the decision-making process, and in acting ultimately as gatekeepers, along with others in our society, to ensure that we maintain a balanced and effective constitutional and democratic system.

We have been fortunate in Canada in developing and maintaining an able, publicly motivated and honest civil service, comparable with the best to be found anywhere in the world. I am proud to have served in its senior ranks, and I do not share—in fact, I abhor—the "bureaucrat bashing" which is fashionable these days in many circles in Canada.

Let me be clear that I fully realize a state of perfection has not been achieved by the Public Service. It is composed of a good relative sampling of Canadians and shares with them their faults—no more and, alas, no less. The report of the Auditor General, J. J. Macdonell, is probably a fair appraisal of the state of mind of both the political and public service. It has been too easy to repair mistakes by more spending, and thus paper over the issues, rather than admit to error and take harder decisions. It has been easier to overlook the inadequate performance of one's colleagues than to challenge them and deal with the operating and personal trauma that flows from taking such a step.

Let us not pretend that such things are unknown in the world of corporate management, or even in the management of our own personal lives. And let us not use the hindsight of today to make ex post facto judgments on the behaviour of those who had only the gift of the foresight of yesterday. I recall the remarkable insight of Harry Truman, who once said that hindsight could turn any school boy into the most brilliant statesman of yesterday's events.

What Canada must have and maintain in its Public Service is public spirit, integrity, managerial ability, and that remarkable, rare and vital ingredient, the willingness to get things done. I heard a few days ago a joke which I think is fashionable in Ottawa at the moment. It seems that a new game has been brought out since the Auditor General's report called "Bureaucrat." Every player takes the role of some senior public servant. At the end of the game, the public servant to make the fewest moves wins. I tell this story for the obvious purpose of demonstrating a mood we do not want to see develop. It would be disastrous to this country if the new game in Ottawa is "Bureaucrat," or "Save your own neck," instead of "Let's tackle the problem and try to get something done, even if we make a few mistakes."

Of course, I make no argument for sloppiness, lack of adequate planning, poor execution, giving too much time to political and too little time to economic and social considerations, such as in hiring or spending allocations. What I ask all Canadians to realize is that teamwork is the vital concomitant in a viable and effective Public Service, as it is in any organized human effort. The price of having an energetic, well-motivated team with a sense of initiative is low, compared to a self-protective, individualistic, and to-hell-with-the-public "Bureaucrat" game. In tightening up our practices of administration, let us not forget the trite but true "pennywise, pound foolish" axiom.

There are many changes which I would like to see made in the Public Service, but in the interests of a priority list let me deal with one which to my mind is close to the top. It is the role and public responsibility of the deputy minister group known in our civil service as "deputy heads." The tradition of the deputy heads is that they are "non-political" and that they are expected to serve political masters of different parties with the same intelligence, honesty and competence. On the whole, I think the Public Service of Canada has tried to do this, and I am not critical of the efforts of its members as much as I am of the system under which they work.

Let us look at the contradictions. The deputy minister is the final adviser to his minister on policy. Let us hope that the deputy minister believes in his advice, and let us assume that the minister and the government accept it. Thus, a political act is born. But the other political parties may oppose it. Consequently, the deputy minister's belief system is opposite to that of someone who, having stood for something different in an election, now comes forward as the minister. The deputy minister has these choices: (a) to discover his Damascus, (b) to dissemble and do what he does not believe in, or (c) to keep his belief but work openly or surreptitiously to convert the new minister and the new government. Surely the minister is better off with a deputy minister he believes in rather than one he questions. Should not the system permit this, instead of presuming a fiction that every deputy minister is a creature who can serve whatever master comes his way equally well?

• (1530)

Do any honourable senators believe the well-attended fiction that the deputy minister is concerned with policy, not politics, and the minister with politics, not policy. Dean Henry Angus, the great Canadian political scientist, who was well exposed to the Ottawa of a few years ago, mentioned this principle of constitutional practice to his basic political science class, of which I was a member—and then had the good judgment to break out laughing. In form, the deputy minister can behave as if politics are of no interest to him, but in practice his advice would be useless to his minister if it did not include much more than amateur insight into what is politically viable and acceptable. My old textbook described the deputy minister as a Janus-like figure with one face in the direction of impartiality and policy, and the other in the direction of impartiality and politics. It took quite a while for me to realize that however many faces the deputy minister may have, he or she still has only one brain.

I will concern honourable senators with only one more facet of this matter, and that is the issue of secrecy. Civil servants are not accountable, only their ministers are, under our constitutional conventions. This is based on the theory of their being non-political. Therefore, if the deputy minister were recognized to be political, as I have argued is the reality, then the deputy minister should be accountable. Or, for those who like parity in their reasoning, if the deputy minister should be accountable, then he must be allowed to be political.

In my view there is too much made of secrecy in certain places in our public affairs, and not nearly enough made of it in other such places. The real key to a more open government, which many, including myself, desire, is in the redefinition of the role of the deputy minister.

I am suggesting something I believe to be both simple and significant. Let us admit the politicality of the deputy minister. Let him or her be a deputy minister and not a British-style permanent secretary, which, in their true forms, are quite different things. The deputy minister will continue to be the chief executive officer of the department, but under the direction of the cabinet, and of the minister on behalf of the cabinet. The assistant deputy ministers will be non-political civil servants and chief operating officers of their branches. I am only describing the present form, and I suggest that no change in that form is necessary except in recognition.

The change, nonetheless, is substantial, and it lies in the accountability of the deputy minister to Parliament for the performance of his role, which is a quite different one from that of his minister, who is a legislator and a member of the elected executive. In this better defined reality the minister will focus, as he does now, on the public attitude, and on the ways to govern and explain policy to the public. The deputy minister will do what he now does, but knowing it is with a commitment on his part to be a member of a political team. I think it would make the bureaucrats much more responsive to the public, more democratic in their mentality, and would eliminate a part of the highly contentious and negative "town and gown" attitude which is developing in Canada.

The redefinition of who and what is a deputy minister would allow the Prime Minister of the day to recruit the best he could find anywhere in the country, and, of course, be responsible for his choice to the public. It would add a measure of expertise to Ottawa which I believe would be advantageous. Of course, when the government changed, the deputy minister would also change, vastly enriched in experience and able to move on again, perhaps to private life. A cache of such people would do much to reduce the misunderstandings and sense of conflict that exist between those in private life and those in government service. If a deputy minister had been appointed from the Public Service, I would preserve that tenure and allow him to return to a senior civil service position in some area away from his previous role, and obviously under the direction of a new political deputy minister.

What I am arguing for is not without precedent. It is, for example, well and beneficially the practice in the United States and West Germany, and so far as I know there has been no impairment of their democracy or the high quality of their public service. Canadians have a tendency to stick to British practice without a careful examination of how that plant is doing in quite different soil. It seems to me that we could make some highly beneficial changes if we would go off "automatic", and take a more careful look at what we do.

Honourable senators, if you have any patience left, I thank you for it as I take my seat.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 19, 1978, at 8 p.m.

FUGITIVE OFFENDERS BILL

MOTION FOR THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—BILL REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 14, the debate on the motion in amendment of Senator Perrault to the motion of Senator McIlraith for the third reading of Bill S-9, respecting fugitive offenders in Canada.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, when this motion in amendment was before the house on Thursday last, it was suggested that the bill be referred back to the committee for further examination. At that time I indicated I would like to consider the matter over the weekend, and that I would then speak to it further tonight.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline which was tabled on Wednesday, December 6.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity of speaking to the first report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline. I think I should begin by advising those who have not already heard the news that a press release was issued today by the Deputy Prime Minister to the effect that Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Ltd. have been authorized to enter into negotiations with two steel companies in Canada, namely, the Interprovincial Steel Company of Regina and the Steel Company of Canada in Hamilton, for the supply of the whole amount, that is, 1.5 million tons, of steel pipe required for the construction of the northern gas pipeline system throughout its entire length in Canada. The press release, in part, states as follows:

Ipsco and Stelco have quoted the lowest prices of the North American bidders, and are the only ones at present technically capable of supplying the required line pipe.

They also have the potential to provide the maximum benefit to Canada.

I was at the meeting of the House of Commons committee as an observer this morning when the announcement was made, and under cross-examination one of the vice-presidents of Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Ltd. pointed out that certainly the discounted Canadian dollar, at 84 or 85 American cents, or whatever the price happens to be at the moment, was helpful to the Canadian companies bidding for this rather large amount of steel pipe. At the same time, he pointed out that even if the Canadian dollar had been at par, these two Canadian companies were the most competitive from the point of view of both price and ability to supply the pipe for this particular project.

Among the various types of evaluation that Foothills was required to make of all the bids was a commercial one. There was, of course, a technical evaluation as well, and on this point I would like to quote from the summary of the Foothills evaluation that was provided to both the Northern Pipeline Agency and the minister responsible for this project. It says:

Analysis on an f.o.b. delivered basis for each specification quoted shows that Ipsco and Stelco were price competitive with all invited bidders, and that their tenders were substantially lower than those submitted by any of the U.S. mills.

In view of the concern and apprehension expressed when the bill for the construction of the northern pipeline was going through Parliament, I think all Canadians should derive a great deal of satisfaction from the fact that when these Canadian companies were subjected to total North American competition, and indeed, in some respects, to worldwide competition, they were successful. Not only did they come out on top in a strictly commercial and technical evaluation, but their bids, if I may paraphrase the words of the company representative, were substantially better than any received from any part of the world. As I said, we can take a lot of satisfaction from the fact that Canada has developed the technical skills and the plant capacity to turn out pipe to the specifications and in the amounts required for this particular pipeline. It certainly augurs well for the future when these Canadian mills and their suppliers are fully competitive in this kind of construction with any others in the world.

Honourable senators, the report which was tabled in this house several days ago deals with a number of things the committee has considered since it began its deliberations earlier this year. One of the matters considered was that of the financing capability of Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Ltd. to raise the massive amounts of capital required for this pipeline. You will realize, of course, that there have been press reports from time to time questioning whether or not the financing can be arranged without some underwriting by either the United States or Canadian government.

Under interrogation and cross-examination, the witnesses on behalf of Foothills (Yukon) Ltd. appearing before your committee from time to time continued to express the confidence they expressed at the outset of their application to the National Energy Board that this can indeed be financed without any specific underwriting by either the Government of the United States or the Government of Canada. But when you get deeper into what has been done to date, in view of the fact that the Northern Pipeline Act was passed last April, you find that the company is unable to give any specific details because there are a number of things that have to be settled in advance of a serious attempt to raise the funds.

In the first place, up until September 27 it was not possible for the company to give anything specific. That was the date when the Senate of the United States passed the energy bill, and it was not until three or four weeks later that the House of Representatives passed it. Passage of that bill was absolutely essential because it made known not only the price from the producer's side—that is as it relates to the gas going into the pipeline near Prudhoe Bay—but also the price, and the manner of determining the price, of the gas coming out of the pipeline into the utility company system in what I refer to as mainland United States.

That is not all, honourable senators, because there is still one factor in determining these prices that has to be decided by the regulatory body in the United States, commonly known as FERC, and that is the cost, and where that cost can be applied, insofar as processing the gas is concerned. It amounts to only a few cents per Mcf, but with the massive amount of gas—over 2.5 billion cubic feet—that is anticipated to go through this line every day, it will be understood that two or three cents per thousand cubic feet amounts to a lot of money.

My information earlier today is that the regulatory body in the United States still has not made that decision. Therefore it is not possible for the producers in Alaska to enter into contracts with the users in the United States—and in this case it is the user utility companies—until they know where those costs can be applied.

I should go further and say that before Foothills Pipe Lines (Yukon) Limited can seriously go to the financial markets and start to raise these funds, or get commitments for these funds, they have to have contracts in their possession between the producers and users.

So it is not possible to give members of this house a definitive answer that financing has proceeded. It was hoped earlier this year that many of these hurdles would have been overcome some time ago, but they are not yet completely finished.

Other factors that were considered at several meetings of the committee were the environmental and socio-economic conditions along the way. I do not want to go into any detail about those aspects because we have not received from the Northern Pipeline Agency a final set of environmental or socio-economic conditions that will apply to the company's operations along the route of the pipeline.

We have the second draft of the socio-economic and environmental conditions, but only in relation to that part of the pipeline inside the Yukon. We expect to receive additional drafts from time to time. We received a copy of the original draft dealing with these conditions along the rest of the pipeline, but we have not received a copy of the second draft, which I believe has been under preparation since mid-July. When the original draft was presented, the commissioner, the Honourable Mitchell Sharp, said that anyone who wanted to make representations to the agency with respect to subsequent drafts should do so by the end of June. At the last meeting he said that this deadline would be somewhat extended.

Another matter that was considered in committee—I believe it occupied more of our time than any other—is the method of acquiring land rights, or easements, from landowners along the route of the pipeline.

Our information indicated that there was a substantial difference between the federal methods of acquiring acquisition of pipeline rights of way and the provincial methods. In most cases landowners are familiar with provincial statutes and regulations, but not many landowners are familiar with the federal law.
